Its commanding position with reference to the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas, the character of its population, its situation midway between our southern coast and the island of Santo Domingo; its safe and capacious harbor of the Habana, fronting a long line of our shores destitute of the same advantage; the nature of its productions and its wants, furnishing the supplies and needing the returns of a commerce immensely profitable and mutually beneficial, give it an importance in the sum of our national interests with which that of no other foreign territory can be compared, and little inferior to that which binds the different members of this Union together. Such, indeed, are between the interests of that island and of this country, the geographical, commercial, moral, and political relations formed by nature gathering in the process of time and even now verging to maturity, that in looking forward to the possible course of events for the short period of half a century it is scarcely possible to resist the conviction that the annexation of Cuba to our F

On April 27, 1825, Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, in a dispatch to Mr. A. H. Everett, our minister at Madrid, instructing him to use his exertions to induce Spain to make peace with her revolted colonies, says in part:

Colonies, says in part:

The United States are satisfied with the present condition of those islands [Ouba and Porto Rico] in the hands of Spain, with their ports open to our commerce, as they are now open. This Government desires no political change of that condition. The population itself of the islands is incompetent at present, from its composition and amount, to maintain self-government. The maritime force of the neighboring republics of Mexico and Colombia is not now, nor is it likely shortly to be adequate to the protection of those islands if the conquest of them were effected. The United States would entertain constant apprehensions of their passing from their possession to that of some less friendly sovereignty; and of all the European powers, this country prefers that Cuba and Porto Rico should remain dependent upon Spain. If the war should continue between Spain and the new republics, and those islands should become the object and theater of it, their fortunes have such a connection with the prosperity of the United States that they could not be indifferent spectators; and the possible contingencies of such a protracted war might bring upon the Government of the United States duties and obligations, the performance of which, however painful it should be, they might not be at liberty to decline.

Mr. Van Buren, writing to Mr. Van Ness, our minister to Spain.

Mr. Van Buren, writing to Mr. Van Ness, our minister to Spain, October 2, 1829, says:

The Government of the United States have always looked with the deepest interest upon the fate of those islands, but particularly of Cuba. Its geographical position, which places it almost within sight of our southern shores, and, as it were, gives it the command of the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas; its safe and capacious harbors; its rich productions, the exchange of which for our surplus agricultural products and manufactures constitutes one of the most extensive and valuable branches of our foreign trade, render it of the utmost importance to the United States that no change should take place in its condition which would injuriously affect our political and commercial standing in that quarter.

Other considerations connected with a certain class of our population make it the interest of the southern section of the Union that no attempt should be made in that island to throw off the yoke of Spanish dependence, the first effect of which would be the sudden emancipation of a numerous slave population, the result of which could not but be sensibly felt upon the adjacent shores of the United States. On the other hand, the wisdom which induced the Spanish Government to relax in its colonial system, and to adopt, with regard to those islands, a more liberal policy, which opened their ports to general commerce, has so far been satisfactory in the view of the United States as, in addition to other considerations, to induce this Government to desire that their possession should not be transferred from the Spanish Crown to any other power. In conformity with this desire, the ministers of the United States at Madrid have, from time to time, been instructed to watch attentively the course of events and the secret springs of European diplomacy, which, from information received from various quarters, this Government had reason to suspect had been put in motion to effect the transfer of the possession of Cuba to the powerful allies of Spain.

You are authorized to say that the long-established and well-known policy of the United States, which forbids their entangling themselves in the concerns of other nations, and which permits their physical force to be used only for the defense of their political rights and the protection of the persons and property of their citizens, equally forbids their entangling themselves in the concerns of other nations, and which permits their physical force to be used only for the defense of their political rights and the protection of the persons and property of their citizens, equally forbids their entan

This Government has also been given to understand that if Spain should persevere in the assertion of a hopeless claim to dominion over her former colonies they will feel it to be their duty as well as their interest to attack her colonial possession in our vicinity—Cuba and Porto Rico. Your general instructions are full upon the subject of the interest which the United States take in the fate of those islands, and particularly of the former; they inform you that we are content that Cuba should remain as it now is, but could not consent to its transfer to any European power. Motives of reasonable State policy render it more desirable to us that it should remain subject to Spain rather than to either of the South American states. Those motives will readily present themselves to your mind; they are principally founded upon an apprehension that if possessed by the latter it would, in the present state of things, be in greater danger of becoming subject to some European power than in its present condition.

Although such are our own wishes and true interests, the President does not see on what ground he would be justified in interfering with any attempts which the South American states might think it for their interest in the prosecution of a defensive war to make upon the islands in question. If, indeed, an attempt should be made to disturb them by putting arms in the hands of one portion of their population to destroy another, and which in its influence would endanger the peace of a portion of the United States, the case might be different. Against such an attempt the United States (being informed that it was in contemplation) have already protested and warmly remonstrated in their communication last summer with the Government of Mexico, but the information lately communicated to us in this regard was accompanied by a solemn assurance that no such measures will in any event be resorted to and that the contest, if forced upon them, will be carried on on their part with stric

Mr. Buchanan, in a dispatch to Mr. R. M. Saunders of June 17, 1848, says:

Mr. Buchanan, in a dispatch to Mr. R. M. Saunders of June 17, 1848, says:

With these considerations in view, the President [Polk] believes that the crisis has arrived when an effort should be made to purchase the island of Cuba from Spain, and he has determined to intrust you with the performance of this most delicate and important duty. The attempt should be made, in the first instance, in a confidential conversation with the Spanish minister of foreign affairs; a written offer might produce an absolute refusal in writing, which would embarrass us hereafter in the acquisition of the island. Besides, from the incessant changes in the Spanish cabinet and policy, our desire to make the purchase might thus be made known in an official form to foreign governments and arouse their jealousy and active opposition. Indeed, even if the president of the cabinet should think favorably of the proposition, they might be greatly embarrassed by having it placed on record, for in that event it would almost certainly, through some channel, reach the opposition, and become the subject of discussion in the Cortes. Such delicate negotiations, at least in their incipient stages, ought always to be conducted in confidential conversation and with the utmost secrecy and dispatch.

At your interview with the minister of foreign affairs you might introduce the subject by referring to the present distracted condition of Cuba, and the danger that exists that the population will attempt to accomplish a revolution. This must be well known to the Spanish Government. In order to convince him of the good faith and friendship toward Spain with which this Government has acted you might read to him the first part of my dispatch to General Campbell, and the order issued by the Secretary of War to the commanding general in Mexico, and to the officers having charge of the embarkation of our troops at Vera Cruz. You may then touch delicately upon the danger that Spain may lose Cuba by a revolution in the island or that it may be wrested from her by ral order and you can fill up the outline from the information communicated in this dispatch, as well as from your own knowledge of the subject. Should the minister of foreign affairs lend a favorable ear to your proposition, then the question of the consideration to be paid would arise, and you have been furnished with information in this dispatch which will enable you to discuss furnished with information in this dispatch which will enable you to discuss that question.

The President would be willing to stipulate for the payment of $100,000,000. This, however, is the maximum price, and if Spain should be willing to sell you will use your efforts to purchase it at a rate as much below that sum as is practicable. In case you should be able to conclude a treaty you may adopt as your model, so far as the same may be applicable, the two conventions of April 30, 1803, between France and the United States for the sale and purchase of Louisiana. The seventh and eighth articles of the first of these conventions ought, if possible, to be omitted. Still, if this should be indispensible to the accomplishment of the object, articles similar to them may be retained.

BUCHANAN.

On June 17, 1848, Buchanan, who was then Secretary of State, charged Saunders, of North Carolina, who was then envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Spain, in the name of the President to introduce the matter confidentially to the Spanish Government, and he authorized him to go as high in his offer as $100,000,000. Mr. Buchanan in part said:

The question could not be a local one in the United States, for human foresight could not anticipate the beneficial consequences which would result to every portion of our Union, and the acquisition of the island would strengthen the Union in high degree. (Executive Document, Thirty-second Congress, first session, No. 121, pp. 43. FF.)

In Senate, Friday, January 5, 1849, the following resolution offered by Jacob W. Miller, a Senator from the State of New Jersey, December 18, 1848, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether any and what negotiations or correspondence have taken place between this Government and the Government of Spain, or between any persons acting under the direction or authority of either Government, in relation to the purchase of Cuba by the United States; and that he communicate to the Senate copies of such negotiations or correspondence, so far as the same may be communicated consistently with the public interest.

Mr. Henry S. Foote, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, was apparently in favor of the annexation of Cuba, for, on a motion to lay the resolution on the table, Senator Foote said:

From the manner in which this subject has been introduced by the Senator from New Jersey, I feel myself authorized to propound an inquiry to him which he may answer or not, at his pleasure and discretion. I wish to know, in the event of his ascertaining that any correspondence or negotiations in reference to this subject have actually taken place, whether he is prepared to assume an attitude hostile to the annexation of Cuba to this country, and whether he is, or is not, prepared to act upon the subject. If he is not prepared to act, then I think there is no necessity for this resolution. If, however, the Senator from New Jersey, in the event of such correspondence or negotiations having actually occurred, or being in progress, intends to throw obstacles in the way for the purpose of preventing its consummation, there is some reason for his resolution. But if he intends to remain inactive, and is resolved that no action shall follow after the information shall be obtained, I must repeat that I see not the slightest reason whatever for the passage of the resolution.

Senator Miller replied:

Mr. President, perhaps it would be wise in me to reserve my answer to the question of the Senator from Mississippi until the facts of the case are laid before the country, but I have no desire to conceal my opinions or intentions in regard to this matter. My own opinion is made up upon this subject, and I do not hesitate to say that I shall be opposed to the annexation of Cuba to this country at all times and under all circumstances.

Senator Foote replied:

I would simply state that if such be the determination of the honorable Senator from New Jersey he will find himself in an awkward position in less than four months, for the President-elect [Taylor] is decidedly in favor of the annexation of Cuba and has so declared himself.

Mr. Clayton, when Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Barringer, August 2, 1849, in part as follows:

As to the purchase of Cuba from Spain, we do not desire to renew the proposition made by the late Administration [Polk] on this subject. It is understood that the proposition made by our late minister at Madrid, under instructions from this Department, or from the late President of the United States, was considered by the Spanish ministry as a national indignity and that the sentiment of the ministry was responded to by the Cortes.

After all that has occurred, should Spain desire to part with the island the proposition for its cession to us should come from her; and in case she should make any you will content yourself with transmitting the same to your Government for consideration.

This very readily explains why the United States has never acquired Cuba. Spain did not wish to part with Cuba, and the United States did not feel like renewing the proposition for its cession to us

Mr. Everett, in his celebrated letter of December 1, 1852, to the Comte de Sartiges, rejecting the joint proposition of the French and British Governments for a tripartite convention with the United States, disclaiming, severally and collectively, all intention to obtain possession of the island of Cuba, and respectively binding themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of any power or individuals whatever, said:

Spain, meantime, has retained of her extensive dominions in this hemisphere but the two islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. A respectful sympathy with the fortunes of an ancient ally and a gallant people with whom the United States have ever maintained the most friendly relations would, if no other reason existed, make it our duty to leave her in the undisturbed possession of this little remnant of her mighty trans-Atlantic empire. The President desires to do so. No word or deed of his will ever question her title or shake her possession. But can it be expected to last very long? Can it resist this mighty current in the fortunes of the world? Is it desirable that it should do so? Can it be for the interest of Spain to cling to a possession that can only be maintained by a garrison of twenty-five or thirty thousand troops, a powerful naval force, and an annual expenditure for both arms of the service of at least $12,000,000.

Cuba at this moment costs more to Spain than the entire naval and military establishment of the United States costs the Federal Government. So far from being really injured by the loss of this island, there is no doubt that, were it peacefully transferred to the United States, a prosperous commerce between Cuba and Spain, resulting from ancient associations and common language and tastes, would be far more productive than the best contrived system of colonial taxation. Such notoriously has been the result to Great Britain of the establishment of the independence of the United States. The decline of Spain from the position which she held in the time of Charles V is coeval with the foundation of her colonial system, while within twenty-five years and since the loss of most of her colonies she has entered upon a course of rapid improvement unknown since the abdication of that Emperor.

The policy of the United States on this subject was discussed by Mr. Everett in the same letter as follows:

The island of Cuba lies at our doors. It commands the approach to the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. It bars the entrance to that great river which drains one half of the Northern American Continent and with its tributaries forms the largest of water communications in the world. It keeps watch at the doorway of our intercourse with California by the Isthmus route. * * * The opinions of American statesmen at different times and under varying circumstances have differed as to the desirableness of the acquisition of Cuba by the United States. Territorially and commercially it would in our hands be an extremely valuable possession. Under certain contingencies it might be also essential to our safety.

PIERCE.

President Pierce, in his inaugural address, March 4, 1853, said:

With an experience thus suggestive and cheering, the policy of my Administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised that our attitude as a nation and our position on the globe render the acquisition of certain possessions not within our jurisdiction eminently important for our protection, if not in the future essential for the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world. Should they be obtained it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to various national interests and security and in a manner entirely consistent with the strictest observance of national faith.

The nation and, in fact, the world knew the President was referring to Cuba, and it is very evident that this Democratic authority was not afraid of the doctrine of expansion.

Mr. Marcy, in his dispatch of July 23, 1853, to Mr. Pierre Soulé, says:

Soulé, says:

Sir: There are circumstances in the affairs of Spain, having a connection with this country, which give unusual importance at this time to the mission to that Government. The proximity of her remaining possessions in this hemisphere—the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico—to the United States, the present condition of the former, and the rumors of contemplated changes in its internal affairs complicate our relations with Spain. The island of Cuba, on account of its magnitude, situation, fine climate, rich productions, far superior in all respects to any in the West India group, is a desirable possession to Spain, and for the same reasons very difficult for her to retain in its present condition of dependence. The opinion generally prevails among the European nations that the Spanish dominion over it is insecure. This was clearly evinced by the alacrity with which both England and France, on occasion of the late disturbances in Cuba, volunteered their aid to sustain the Spanish rule over it, and by their recent proposition to the United States for a tripartite convention to guarantee its possession to Spain. Without an essential change in her present policy—such a change as she will most likely be unwilling to make—she can not, it is confidently believed, long sustain, unaided, her present connection with that island.

What will be its destiny after it shall cease to be a dependency of Spain, is a question with which some of the principal powers of Europe have seen fit to concern themselves, and in which the United States have a deep and direct interest.

a question with which some of the principal powers of Europe have seen fit to concern themselves, and in which the United States have a deep and direct interest.

I had occasion recently, in preparing instructions to our minister to London, to present the views of the President in relation to the interference of Great Britain, as well as of France in * * * Cuban affairs. To spare myself the labor of again going over the same ground, I herewith furnish you with an extract from those instructions.

"The policy of the Government of the United States in regard to Cuba, in any contingency calling for our interposition, will depend, in a great degree, upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, and can not therefore now be presented with much precision beyond what is indicated in the instructions before referred to. Nothing will be done on our part to disturb its connection with Spain, unless the character of that connection should be so changed as to affect our present or prospective security. While the United States would resist at every hazard the transference of Cuba to any European nation, they would exceedingly regret to see Spain resorting to any power for assistance to uphold her rule over it. Such a dependence on foreign aid would in effect invest the auxiliary with the character of a protector, and give it a pretext to interfere in our affairs, and also generally in those of the North American Continent. In case of a collision with the United States such a protecting power would be in a condition to make nearly the same use of the island to annoy us as it could do if it were the absolute possessor of it. "Our minister at Madrid, during the administration of President Polk, was instructed to ascertain if Spain was disposed to transfer Cuba to the United States for a liberal pecuniary consideration. I do not understand, however, that it was at the time the policy of this Government to acquire that island unless its inhabitants were very generally disposed to concur in the transfer. Under certain conditions t of this nature, there are many other reasons for believing that Spain will pertinaciously hold on to Cuba, and that the separation, whenever it takes place, will be the work of violence."

On April 3, 1854, this Government sent instructions to Pierre Soulé, of Louisiana, who was then minister to Spain, which instructions included fully the desire and determination of the United States to acquire Cuba, in part as follows:

structions included fully the desire and determination of the United States to acquire Cuba, in part as follows:

The unsettled condition of political affairs in Spain and the trouble which may arise in the island of Cuba from the experiment now making to introduce a new system for supplying the demand for agricultural labor are here regarded as circumstances which may open the way to the accomplishment of the object so much desired by the United States. In view of the contingencies which may arise, the President has deemed it proper that you should be furnished with full power to enter into a convention or treaty for the purchase of Cuba. * * * The change of policy in Cuba, particularly with regard to supplying the demand for agricultural labor, has increased discontent and created alarm among the people of that island and made them more averse to the continuance of Spanish rule and more willing to come under the protection of the United States.

Though the pride of Spain might revolt at the proposition to sell the island of Cuba to a foreign power, it has been suggested that she might be induced to consent to its independence, and that the United States might essentially contribute to such a result. (Executive Document, 2d sess., 33d Cong., vol. 10, No. 92, pp. 80, 81, 82.)

So anxious were the South and the Democratic party to divorce Cuba from Spain and place Cuba under the sovereignty of the United States that on the list of May, 1854, Mr. John Slidell, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, endeavored to charge the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the Senate to consider the expediency of authorizing the President to suspend the neutrality laws for twelve months while Congress was not in session. (Congressional Globe, 1st sess., 33d Cong., pp. 1021.)

Even war with Spain was contemplated to secure possession of Cuba for the mere purpose of acquiring territory, and not with a view to bettering the condition of the President and empower him to employ the Army and Navy and authorize the levy of 50,000 voluntee

The Democratic platform of 1856 by implication strongly advocated the doctrine of expansion and the acquisition of Cuba, and after having put out a feeler in this direction, felt so much encouraged that the Democratic convention that met in Charleston, S. C., April 23, 1860, and adjourned to Baltimore, Md., June 18, at which time Douglas was nominated for President and Johnson for Vice-President, adopted as a plank in their platform the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Democratic party are in favor of the acquisition of the island of Cuba on such terms as shall be honorable to ourselves and just to

The bolting faction of the Democratic party that nominated Breckinridge for President and Lane for Vice-President were a little more insistent, and declared in strong terms their desire for Cuba, as will be seen by the following plank in their platform:

That the Democratic party are in favor of the acquisition of the island of Cuba on such terms as shall be honorable to ourselves and just to Spain at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. Buchanan had strong convictions on this subject. In his second annual message, December 6, 1858, he says:

Second annual message, December 0, 1808, he says:

It has been made known to the world by my predecessors that the United States have on several occasions endeavored to acquire Cuba from Spain by honorable negotiation. * * The island of Cuba, from its geographical position, commands the mouth of the Mississippi and the immense and annually increasing trade, foreign and coastwise, from the valley of that noble river, now embracing half the sovereign States of the Union. With that island under the dominion of a distant foreign power, this trade, of vital importance to these States, is exposed to the danger of being destroyed in time of war, and it has hitherto been subjected to perpetual injury in time of peace. * * *

When Mr. Buchanan wrote his third annual message, December 19, 1859, he was still of the opinion that the United States ought to have Cuba, for he says:

I need not repeat the arguments which I urged in my last annual message favor of the acquisition of Cuba by fair purchase. My opinions in that measure remain unchanged. I therefore again invite the serious attention of Congress to this important subject. Without a recognition of this policy on their part it will be almost impossible to institute negotiations with any reasonable prospect of success.

If Mr. Buchanan ever changed his mind on this subject, he left no evidence whatever behind him, but as time rolled on he grew more insistent as will be seen by language used when Congress met in December, 1860. At this time civil war threatened our nation; we were in danger of losing part of our territory; yet Mr. Buchanan found time to consider the Cuban situation, for in his fourth annual message, December, 1860, he in part says:

I reiterate the recommendation contained in my annual message of December, 1858, and repeated in that of December, 1859, in favor of the acquisition of Cuba from Spain by fair purchase. I firmly believe that such an acquisition would contribute essentially to the well-being and prosperity of both countries in all future time.

Mr. Stephen R. Mallory, Senator from Florida, was very outspoken. In the Senate of the United States, on February 25, 1859, after reviewing the subject fully and criticising Spain very sharply, the Senator said:

Sir, when I reflect upon the geographical position of Cuba, upon its command of our commerce, upon its iron despotism, upon the claims of her people upon us, upon its fertility and resources, but, above all, upon the repeated provocations which Spain has given us, I am reminded of the reply of Lord Clive when called before the parliamentary committee to answer for his alleged spoliation of the Indian princes: "By heaven, gentlemen, when I reflect upon the temptation, I am astonished at my own moderation." * * *

And the Senator further said, in the course of his remarks, that we could have had Cuba on several occasions by paying down a sum of money to a mediator; and then, continuing, he said:

But, sir, I am asked what I would do if Spain should reject all reasonable terms. I can hardly suppose such a contingency, sir, but I would be prepared to meet it. I would in such case act openly and fairly with her, and look directly at the contingency of taking Cuba and talking about it afterwards, as Frederick did with Silesia. PIKE.

First Blows of the Civil War, page 227, says, in quoting from the Southern Standard:

With Cuba and San Domingo we could control the production of the Tropics, and with them the commerce of the world, and with that the power of the world.

De Bow's Commercial Review, published in New Orleans, volume 9, page 173, declared that public opinion was almost unanimously convinced that Cuba was indispensably necessary to the right development and security of the country.

Louisiana, because of its sugar industry, was opposed to the annexation, and the publisher at that time had no sympathy with it, hence this opinion is important as showing the views of her people at that time.

January 10, 1859, Mr. John Slidell, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, introduced a bill (S. 497) making appropriation to facilitate the acquisition of the island of Cuba by negotiation.

Such was the position taken by what was recognized at the time as farseeing statesmen of the highest patriotism.

The island of Cuba, from its geographical position, commands the mouth of the Mississippi to-day as much as in the day that the great men I have quoted wrote. If it would have been detrimental to the interests of this nation to have the island under the dominion of a foreign power the day they wrote, it would be just as disastrous to us to-day.

To undertake to present every argument in favor of the continued extension of our sovereignty over that island would be but a feeble attempt to quote from the great men who have already written on this subject. Not a word can be added to what has been said by the advocates of acquisition; not a word controverted. A few figures might be changed on account of the great increase in commerce.

Independently of the joint resolution adopted by Congress, approved April 20, 1898, no arguments can be made against the continued extension of our sovereignty over that island. I am not unmindful of the adoption of that resolution; I voted for it myself, realizing at the same time that there was no necessity for its adoption.

This nation was absolutely forced to declare war on Spain. That declaration has met popular approval, and there is not a civilized Christian of any nation but has approved of the act of this Government in that regard.

In this connection I submit a copy of the resolution referred to: [Public resolution—No. 21.]

Joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 255 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Habana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11th, 1888, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Approved, April 20, 1898.

It must be borne in mind that these resolutions are not in the nature of a compact. Those contending that Cuba should have an immediate, free, separate, and independent government can not plead an estoppel.

Cuba has not been misled by the declaration expressed in the resolutions; Cuba did not act to her disadvantage upon anything contained in the resolutions; Cuba was not a party to the resolutions and never agreed to them. By their adoption no fraud was perpetrated, no wrong done. If Cuba could have been consulted at the time the same were being considered by the United States, she would have said with a loud voice to the United States: "Come on! Do anything and everything you please to remove the cold, cruel, and powerful hand of Spain; do not consider our future; do with us as you wish—but free us from Spain."

What more, under the circumstances, could the United States do for a struggling people than put them on the road to American citizenship?

It was said at the time of their adoption that it was necessary for this country to make the declaration therein contained, otherwise it would be presumed that this nation were waging a war on Spain for the acquisition of territory, and that foreign governments would be very likely to charge this nation with an unlawful purpose. Therefore this declaration was made to the world, in order to overcome what was considered by some a pre-sumption; but there is no presumption, when war is declared by Congress, that it is waged for the purpose of conquest or acquisition of territory.

The proximity of the island to this nation would make it a valuable acquisition. Certainly, after having dethroned one foreign power, it will never do for this nation to permit any other foreign power, it will never do for this nation to permit any other foreign power to exercise sovereignty over the island or enter into any alliance or treaty of any kind with the people of Cuba. What guaranty have we, if the sovereignty of this nation be withdrawn from Cuba, that the people of Cuba will not form an alliance with some foreign power?

I would not attempt to justify the continued sovereignty of this nation over the island of Cuba for any selfish purpose, but it can not be denied that from a commercial standarding it it would be a not be denied that from a commercial standpoint it would be a great acquisition to the people of this nation. This nation offered up a great many lives and spent considerable money and caused great suffering among our people for the benefit of the people of Cuba, exclusive of the Spanish portion of the same, and therefore we have a right to consider the interests of our people in this

If we are to withdraw and leave the government of the island to the people of Cuba, then we must have a money consideration for what this nation has done and lost for the people of that island. For my part, I do not very well see how we can make any arrangements with the people of Cuba for our indemnity unless they have a government controlled by the people of Cuba; that is, we must first withdraw our sovereignty and allow them to erect a govern-ment of their own choice, and then take our chances of entering into a treaty for future benefits of the two countries. We should either give notice to the world that we shall continue to exercise sovereignty over the island or else at once withdraw our sovereignty and, in the words of the resolution, "leave the government and control of the island to its people."

We are to-day exercising sovereignty, jurisdiction, and control over the island, so that we have nothing further to do except to give to the people of the island a form of government and give them to understand that they are not only under the sovereignty and jurisdiction of this nation, but that they will have to remain so unless it shall appear to this Government best in the future to leave the government of the island in control of her people.

Every person of understanding, no matter where his political sympathies may be, knows well, without any desire to reflect upon the people of Cuba, that they are not fit to-day for self-government, and that we can not, in justice to ourselves, in justice to the property interests of Cuba, and in justice to other civilized nations, withdraw our sovereignty. If this be true, when will the condition of the island permit us to? If conditions are such to-day that we must retain our sovereignty over the island, then it will be for the interests of all people in the United States and in Cuba and those foreign countries desiring to do business with Cuba that we publicly announce to the world that we shall continue the exercise of sovereignty over the island, and thereby benefit trade and commerce and materially assist the people of Cuba, and aid in the rapid development of that impoverished country

Under the jurisdiction of the United States in a very short time Cuba will be a thrifty, wealthy, and prosperous country. They will furnish us with what we can not furnish ourselves, and in return we can furnish them with a large amount of our surplus productions. The people will readily assimilate with our people, and it will be a right step in the right direction. It will not only bring great prosperity to those people, but will save many lives and prevent a great destruction of valuable property.

The Cubans themselves have nothing to fear from American

If this nation has been capable of governing terrigovernment. If this nation has been capable of governing territory acquired from France, Spain, Mexico, Russia, and England, this people can certainly assist and improve the people of Cuba.

There is no question but there is a strong sentiment among the eople of that island for early and open annexation to the United States; that is, in favor of an early settlement of the question. Cuba can not and will not thrive until it is known to the world that the American flag will continue to float over the island and give the people thereof that peace and quiet so necessary to their prosperity. As early as possible we must assure the commerce of the world that life, liberty, and property will be protected in

Until the American flag is a fixture in Cuba the country can not develop, people there can not improve, and in a little time, unless all signs fail, the people of Cuba will relapse into conditions as bad as when Spain governed that island. American blood, capital, and energy will not go there. Confidence, so much needed, will not be felt unless they have an American government in that

We have nothing further to do as a nation but to indicate that we are going to continue our sovereignty over that island. We are there; we have not got to do a single affirmative act. We acquired the island by conquest, and have as good and perfect a title as can be possibly obtained.

By treaty Spain relinquished all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cabe title to Cuba.

Where does sovereignty reside, if not in the United States? far as title is concerned, it is as much ours as are the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico. The provisions of the treaty on this subject are as follows: Spain relinquishes all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba, and as the island is, upon the evacuation of Spain, to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may, under international law, result from the fact of its occupation for the protection of life and property.

By our act in taking possession of Cuba and forcing Spain to relinquish all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba we assumed great international obligations. We can not discharge those obligations by merely relinquishing our sovereignty over and title to Cuba. Independent of all obligations that can be enforced under international law, we owe it to the people of Cuba to assist them. We can not assist them by relinquishing our claim to sovereignty over them. It is a part of our destiny that Cuba shall remain forever under the sovereignty of the United States, and the highest duty devolves upon the American people States, and the highest duty devolves upon the American people to assist the people of Cuba to American citizenship.

If anyone doubts that the United States are not exercising sovereignty over Cuba, all they have to do is to refer to "An act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902:"

Provided further, That in fulfillment of the declaration contained in the joint resolution approved April 20, 1898, entitled "For the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect," the President is hereby authorized to "leave the government and control of the island of Cuba to its people" so soon as a government shall have been established in said island under a constitution which, either as a part thereof or in an ordinance apended thereto, shall define the future relations of the United States with Cuba, substantially as follows:

I.

That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain, by colonization or for military or naval purposes or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island.

TT.

That said government shall not assume or contract any public debt to pay the interest upon which and to make reasonable sinking-fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of government, shall be inadequate.

TIT.

That the government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the government of Cuba.

IV.

That all acts of the United States in Cuba during its military occupancy thereof are ratified and validated, and all lawful rights acquired thereunder shall be maintained and protected.

That the government of Cuba will execute, and as far as necessary extend, the plans already devised or other plans to be mutually agreed upon, for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the commerce of the southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein.

That the Isle of Pines shall be omitted from the proposed constitutional boundaries of Cuba, the title thereto being left to future adjustment by treaty.

That to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba, and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defense, the government of Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

VIII.

That by way of further assurance the government of Cuba will embody the foregoing provisions in a permanent treaty with the United States.

Approved March 2, 1901. (Chap. 803, vol. 31, U. S. Stat. L., pp. 895-897.)

Here is an assertion of sovereignty; not only an assertion of sovereignty extending far beyond the resolutions of April 20, 1898, but the United States has assumed the part of a dictator toward Cuba in indicating what their constitution must contain. The resolutions of April 20, 1898, assert that the power and control of the United States over the island is to cease at the pacification thereof. This pacification relates to the difficulty between Spain and Cuba, and not to any difficulty between the United States and Cuba. Therefore, according to the letter and spirit of the resolutions, pacification came to the island when the treaty of peace was

But in any event, whether the United States retains sovereignty over the island or entirely withdraws its sovereignty, there should be no attempt to dictate to the people of Cuba as to what form of government they should adopt or what element should enter into their government.

The act of March 2, 1901, is an important assertion of soverignty, going beyond the pacification spoken of in the resolutions of April 20, 1890; and it would be more consistent on the part of the United States, more to their interest, and of more interest to the people of Cuba to continue exercising sovereignty over the island rather than force the people of Cuba to unwillingly adopt a constitution.

If Cuba should unwillingly adopt what is required by the United States, it will have a tendency to weaken conditions between Cuba and the United States, and the United States will be assuming great responsibilities far beyond what would fall to its lot if the sovereignty of the United States was continued over the island. There would be a continued feeling of hostility between the people of Cuba and the people of the United States, and the people of Cuba would not feel kind toward their constitution and would never recognize it as their constitution. Instead of tending to promote good feeling between the two countries there would be constant friction growing out of the forced adoption of the con-

In its present attitude the United States is assuming the duties and position of a protectorate without the right to interfere to prevent trouble between Cuba and foreign powers. As long as Cuba conforms to requirements of the United States, as required by the act of March 2, 1901, the United States could not control the action of Cuba, or interfere between Cuba and a foreign power, no matter how unjust or unlawful the action of Cuba in this regard. There would be constant danger of a war.

Further, on the record made, Cuba can now, without any further legislation on the part of Congress, adopt any form of constitution, no matter how objectionable to the United States, if the requirements of the act of March 2, 1901, are adopted, to stand without any interference on the part of the United States.

As stated, Cuba is either a territory belonging to the United

As stated, Cuba is either a territory belonging to the United States, over which the United States has a right to continue exercising sovereignty and control, or else it is Cuban territory, and the United States has no lawful rights whatever upon that island. Pacification came by the adoption of the treaty of peace, and there the rights and responsibilities of the United States ended, unless it intends to continue exercising sovereignty over the island. The only justification for the United States to continue to exercise sovereignty over the island and to dictate as to the terms of the constitution is the doubts and fears as to the capability of the Cuban people to exercise governmental powers and as to the attitude of the Cuban government toward the United States after the Cuban people have adopted a constitution and the United States withdrawn its sovereignty over the island.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I feel like offering an apology for occupying the time of the committee. I shall do so apology for occupying the time of the committee. I shall do so but a very few moments. For the first time in my experience in the House of Representatives I rise to make an explanation in regard to an attack that was made upon myself and the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn], who sits by my side, and who occupied the same position in the Congress that expired on the 4th of last March.

I hold in my hand the report of a committee of gentlemen purporting to be a committee of the Grand Army of the Republic signed by five gentlemen more or less distinguished in public and private life in the United States, and which report was made to the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic last year, in which they place at the door of a number of gentlemen in this House the failure to pass, in the last session of Congress, what they are pleased to term the veterans' preference bill. I have read the report with a great deal of care, and the real meat in the thing is found in the statement by the committee that the bill the thing is found in the statement by the committee that the bill was stabbed in the House of Representatives, and was defeated by those who ought to have been its friends; that it received in the Senate a "knock-out blow," and received in the House a blow so bitter that the committee see fit to place in the report a list of members who voted against the bill, and call it "a white list, not

A great deal of misunderstanding has gone forth, as I will show by reason of the unjust, unfair, and untruthful report which I hold in my hand. Here is a report emanating from these gentle-men, addressed to the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Cleveland last September, made up of 8 pages of printed matter; and nowhere in the whole of that report does it appear what the bill was against which I voted and against which a very large majority of the House voted. In our absence we are tried, condemned, and held up to the scorn of the Grand Army of the Republic upon a garbled and false statement of what the question before the House of Representatives was. It appears that there had been introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill entitled "A bill (Senate bill No. —)." I will supply that blank in the number later. Like everything else in the report it is ignorantly framed, ignorantly put together, and ignorantly presented. It is entitled "A bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," relating to preference in civil appointments of ex Army and Navy officers. And here is the section as it was reported in the Senate:

SEC. 1754. Officers and enlisted men who served in the Army or Navy of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, as also for promotion therein, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office or employment.

When that bill came into the House of Representatives, or a similar bill, it is said, on the 17th of December, one year ago last December, I was amazed, however much anybody else may have been surprised, to find injected into the bill, as an amendment proposed by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, a certain proposition. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Sulloway] to state if he knows how this amendment came there and where it came from.

Mr. SULLOWAY. It was not framed in our committee.
Mr. GROSVENOR. No, I believe it was reported from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. In the interior portion of the bill we found the following:

And first after the aforementioned veterans of the civil war, those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands

I was amazed that such a proposition could have come from any committee.

Mr. SULLOWAY. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say again that no such bill was ever referred to our committee or reported by our committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I presume it must have come originally from the Committee on Pensions, or else it was offered by some one here in the House of Representatives. What I am trying to get at is that this alleged committee, whose report I hold in my hand, did not offer nor procure to be offered in the Senate any proposition such as we found when the bill came up in the House.

I was taken greatly by surprise, and sought to inquire from whence that provision came. I looked upon it, as I will make definite and certain hereafter, as being calculated utterly to defeat any purpose that I had in supporting a measure favorable to my comrades of the war of 1861–1865.

There was present on the floor of the House, as you gentlemen will remember, an ex-commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, the late lamented Representative Shaw, and I appealed to him to know where that amendment came from. He told me he had no knowledge about it, but insisted that there should be no opposition presented to the action of the committee, or whoever it was that brought that amendment in here. I told him that I could not consent to the passage of that bill under those circumstances, and I felt very free to criticise a pension bill; and most of you gentlemen who have served upon this floor with me well know the reason why, for there never was a measure offered on this floor, whether in the form of a general pension bill or a worthy and proper special pension bill, until that amendment, that I did not support cordially and cheerfully.

I had spent all the years since the war in honest labor for the pensioners. Long before I was elected to Congress I had devoted pensioners. Long before I was elected to Congress I had devoted months of my time to the prosecution of pension claims for the soldiers, always without pay, never having received a cent. When I came here, finding the duties very onerous, I paid out of my own pocket during all the years until clerks were allowed by law a clerk who devoted his time almost entirely to the prosecution of pension claims, and therefore I did not feel any hesitation in criticising this bill nor do I now feel any hesitation in making full explanation of the reason why I was not willing to yote for that measure. tion of the reason why I was not willing to vote for that measure. It will be remembered by those who were present that the bill was in such form that it was necessary to vote for that amendment or defeat the bill. No amendment could be offered, for we were acting under a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. This committee has seen fit to criticise the Speaker of the House in two or three places in the report.

In point of fact, the Speaker of the House had no knowledge or notice whatever of that amendment to this bill; and not only so, I went myself to Mr. Shaw and urged him to withdraw the bill, get the amendment eliminated from the bill, and I assured him that there should be time allowed to the bill for the purpose of its passage. Not only so, but the Speaker of the House had expressly given his consent to the assignment of time for the passage of the bill if that provision was eliminated. Now, what would have been the effect of that provision? It would, in my judgment, if you will read the whole of it carefully and take the rules of the Civil Service Commission, operate to put in front, to use an expressive term, of the old soldiers of 1861–1865 the quarter of million of men, young men, many of whom had served a few months in the camps of the country, and exclude practically by the operation of it all future preferment to the old soldier. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that the time has come when it is necessary that the young men who went for a few months into the service of the country in the Spanish war shall be placed bodily in a position of that kind, and I urged that upon this distinguished representative of the soldier here; and I only regret that he is not living, as he could testify to every word I am stat-ing. I appealed to him, pointed out the mistake which, in my judgment, had been made, and asked him to get up on this floor and withdraw the bill temporarily until an amendment could be made, and then we would pass the bill if it was thought best to do so. But he would not consent, and so the bill came to a vote. Then, with reference to Mr. HEPBURN, they have seen fit to garble his remarks. They have given not one word—and I point it out to you that you may understand the unfairness of this whole report—they have given a little extract from his speech and given no connected sense, so that you could understand distinctly what he meant. They say:

A quotation or two in support of the foregoing statement will suffice. For instance:

Mr. Hepburn, of Iowa, a comrade, said:

"I do not believe that anybody has the right to speak for those men who might be benefited by this law and say that he represents them."

"I do not believe that those men who served from 1861 to 1865, or the masses of them, ask for this legislation." * *

"* * * Under the law as it is to-day, preference is required in matters of appointment, other things being equal, to the old soldier." * *

Mr. Grosvenor (Ohio), a comrade also, said:

"Mr. Speaker, I greatly desire the passage of some legislation"—

Thereby confirming my present statement in regard to this

'upon this subject, but I join the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] in he criticism which he has made." * * *

Then they state:

Sharing in the debate, besides Speaker Henderson, were: Bromwell and Grosvenor, of Ohio; Richardson and Sims, Tennessee; Fowler, New Jersey; Hepburn and Lacey, Iowa; Talbert, South Carolina; Bingham, Pennsylvania; Wheeler, Kentucky; Moddy, McCall, and Gillett, Massachusetts; Clayton and Sulzer, New York; Livingston and Fleming, Georgia, and Mondell, Wyoming.

And here is the strange part of this proposition:

Of these, Bromwell, Bingham, Lacey, Moody, Clayton, and Sulzer spoke, favoring the bill. Speaker Henderson appeared also to do so.

Speaker Henderson did not speak on the bill that I recollect of. I have never known him to speak on any bill since he has been Speaker of the House, and I do not believe he has.

The others opposed it.

Speaking of my honorable friend and gallant comrade, Mr. BINGHAM, with rebel bullets inside of him, and with a long service of honor and distinction in favor of the soldier, he is classified here as a man who stabbed the interest of the soldier in this House; and here are given the names of men who were in the Army and those who were not in that Army, both men upon the Democratic side of the House and men on the Republican side of the House, all classified as enemies of this relief to the old soldier.

Preceding the debate on the demand for a second, the vote by tellers was 67 ayes to 34 noes. Following the debate, the vote on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, as announced by the Speaker, was 51 in the affirmative to 105 in the negative. And so it has gone into history.

I refer now to one other statement in this report.

Your committee can not believe, from what happened on that occasion (as also on June 7, 1900, when the bill came before the House less than one hour before the adjournment of the first session), and a subsequent flat-footed refusal made by the Speaker to the pleas of the commander in chief and the chairman of your committee, on February 11, 1901, for another hearing of one hour on the measure when it could be properly discussed and amended to meet the wishes of its friends, as also to test, on a roll call, who were real friends of the veteran and who his opponents, that there was a desire to treat either the bill or the veterans fairly.

Now, I am not speaking here at the request of the Speaker of the House, but I will state that at the suggestion of the Speaker of the House I went to Mr. Shaw after the bill had passed out of existence, as they say, by overwhelming defeat, and called his attention to the fact that the opposition grew out of the amendment and not out of the bill itself, and I tried to find out whence came the amendment and again failed. I then assured him on the word of the Speaker that if he would bring about a reorganization of the bill upon the lines of the old measure, that there should be time granted to take it up and pass it; but he stood firmly and unshakingly in favor of the amendment or nothing; and that amendment carried the bill down to defeat.

I would vote in the same way I voted on that occasion if it was to be done over again. The real friend of the old soldier is not afraid to criticise any attempt of demagogues to drag him into a arraid to criticise any attempt of demagogues to drag film into a position unjustly prominent and distinguished in this sort of a way. That is all, Mr. Chairman, I have to say on this proposition. I stood where I believed I was doing my duty as a member of the House, and I reiterate I have not any fear to-day of what I believe to be right on a question of this character, lest carping criticism should seek to misrepresent me before the people of my

State or the country.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Hepburn having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Wachter, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 7471) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for transcripts of records and plats in the General Land Office; when the Speaker signed the same.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech against this appropriation, realizing, as everyone present does, that it is necessary and proper to pass this bill to carry out the pension laws of the nation and also that it is but just and right that every nation should be generous toward the old veterans who have stood by her flag and fought her battles. While not speaking in opposition to the bill now before us, nor in any spirit of objection to a liberal policy along this line by our Government, because I believe every nation should nursue a liberal pension because I believe every nation should pursue a liberal pension policy toward men who become disabled and lay down their lives in her defense, yet, at the same time, I believe that extravagance and fraud should be guarded against as much in this department as in any other department of the Government, hence I desire to submit a few general remarks were required. submit a few general remarks upon pension legislation and to call the attention of the House and the country to present conditions. While much is being said about the income and outlay of other departments of the Government, in this department alone hundreds of millions are spent with little or no attention being paid to it. It is to this fact that I desire to call attention especially.

The maintenance of the military pension system of this country, since the close of the civil war, has cost something over two and a half billion dollars, getting into the neighborhood of three billions, and at present nearly one million names are borne upon the national pension roll, making about one for every seventy-five of the population of the United States. Then comes the annual expenditure of about one hundred and forty million dollars, being a sum nearly equal to our total annual receipts from ing a sum nearly equal to our total annual receipts from internal revenue under such conditions as prevailed from 1894 to 1897, and being a sum more than equal to the assessed valuation of several of the States of this Union. It seems to me that these conditions deserve consideration, and are sufficient to make of some importance the pension question of to-day. After the civil war, from the time that the first general pension law was passed, to the present day, not a law providing for pensions has been repealed. Scarcely a session has passed when new laws were not enacted. The Pension Office prints a synopsis of them, and it requires a book of nearly 200 pages to accommodate them. would decrease, but he was woefully mistaken. He placed the maximum at about $30,000,000—a little over one-half of what it took to run the Government under Buchanan in 1860. The bill under consideration carries nearly $140,000,000, exclusive of any new schemes that this Congress may adopt. Let us compare this item with the average cost of the standing armies of the Old World for several years past, and we find Great Britain spending in one year $87,403,944; France, with an army of 500,000 men in 1897, spending $118,291,430; Germany, with an army of nearly 600,000 men, spending $110,187,020; Italy, $51,778,040; Russia, $176,842,600; Austria, $67,280,255, and so on. So that it will be seen that Russia alone of all these countries, with nearly twice the population of the United States, pays more for her immense standing army than the United States pays in pensions. standing army than the United States pays in pensions.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me an interruption?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Would you not prefer to pay a large pension to the citizen soldiery of this country than to have in this country a standing army of 500,000 men?

Mr. TALBERT. I agree with the gentleman; I am not criticising or objecting to this bill, and I am proud of our American soldiery. I am using these figures only for comparison, and to call the attention of the House and the country to the enormous expenditures that are annually made in the Bureau of Pensions in order that some investigation, some regulation may be made to cut down the expenses and ferret out the frauds in the interest of the old soldiers, in the interest of those who deserve it against those who do not deserve it, and in the interest of those who pay the taxes. Before I get through I desire to suggest something that will go far toward curing the defects that I point out, as I understand the matter.

The United States pays more than England and Italy combined, $30,000,000 more than Germany, and $22,000,000 more than France, and I will add just here a statement prepared by the Hon. H. Clay Evans, Commissioner of Pensions, showing in part the operations of the Pension Bureau during the last fiscal year, most of the data being embodied in his annual report, which shows that the

It shows that the number of pensioners on the rolls June 30, 1901, was 997,735, a net gain of 4.206 over last year. The total net loss to the roll during the year was 43,586, which includes 38,153 by death, 853 by remarriage, 1,582 by minors reaching the age of 16, 158 by failure to claim pension, and 1,460 from other causes.

A comparative table shows that the roll for the year just closed is the "high-water mark" in the history of the Pension Bureau, the next highest having been reached in 1898. Of the gains to the rolls during the year, 3,849 were from the war with Spain.

The losses include 2 from the Revolution, 215 from the war of 1812, 826 from the war with Mexico, and 544 from the Indian wars. The gains to the roll since 1898 were 13,334 widows of the war between the States and 5,604 from the Spanish war, total, 13,363. The net gain to the rolls in the four years was 4,021.

Pensions granted to widows under the act of June 27, 1890, during the year numbered 16,610, or nearly 4,500 in excess of those granted the previous year.

Survivors, 8,655: invalids, 739,994: widows, 249,086. These comprise 13,124 widows and the 8,655 survivors on account of old wars prior to 1861, 697,675 invalids, and 88,802 on account of disability originating while in service, mostly in the civil war. 433,114 invalids and 145,111 widows on account of the June 1890, act, civil-war disability not due to service: 650 army nurses, and 3,555 invalids, and 2,049 widows on account of the war with Spain.

The total amount paid to pensioners as first payments on the allowance of their claim during 1901 was $9,934,764, or $106,238 more than the first payments claims allowed, to an average of nearly $1,500 each.

claims allowed, to an average of nearly $1,500 each.

SPANISH WAR CLAIMS.

The fees paid to attorneys amounted to $591,245, an increase of almost $74,000, due to the Spanish war. At least 100,000 of the medical examinations held during the year resulted unfavorably to the claimants. The amount paid to pensioners under the general law during the year was $67,867,233, a decrease of $1,730,253 from the amount paid last year. It is believed that during the fiscal year of 1902 the payments under the general law will be exceeded by those to pensioners under the act of 1890. The Spanish war pensioners received $1,175,225, an increase over last year of $842,320, and the pensioners under the act of 1890, as amended May 6, 1900, received $63,337,481, an increase over last year of $1,207,402.

During the last thirty years the survivors of the war of 1812 and their widows have received $44,841,648; of the Mexican war, $30,201,187, and Indian wars, $5,402,054.

The total disbursements for pensions from July 1, 1790, to June 30 of this year aggregate $2,763,350,033. There were 45,860 claimants for pensions during the year.

ONE SURVIVOR OF 1812.

The pension rolls still contain the names of 1 survivor and 1,527 widows on account of the war of 1812; 1,086 survivors and 3,479 widows on account of Indian wars, and 7,568 survivors and 8,109 widows on account of the Mexican war. The Bureau issued 109,668 certificates of all classes during the year, 44,225 being for original pensions. The number of claims pending July 1, last, was 403,569. The statement gives the following amounts of money paid pensioners under different administrations:

President Grant's first term, $114,395,357; average per year, $29,094,069.

President Grant's second term, $114,395,357; average per year, $28,598,839.

President Cleveland's first term, $305,636,662; average per year, $76,409,166.

President McKinley's first term, $580,000,547; average per year, $140,000,137.

Now, I am glad that the time has come when this great country of ours stands united once more under one flag and one destiny, [applause] with "E pluribus unum" written upon its forehead so plainly that anyone may read it, so that we can discuss this pension question, as well as other great questions, without bitterness or prejudice of one section against another, recognizing no North, South, East, or West in the matter, with Old Glory finding as congenial a climate among the palmettoes of South Carolina as in the frozen regions of the North. All disabled soldiers ought to be well cared for by the Government they fought to uphold, but it must be apparent to all close observers that on our immense pension rolls of nearly 1,000,000 men there are some who do not deserve the bounty of the Government and others who are enjoying an extravagant allowance. Then, let us look at this question not from a partisan or sectional, but from a business, standpoint. I believe if the people could be made to realize the extent of this burden, there would be protests against it and relief would be demanded-at least they would demand that extravagance be curtailed and fraud exposed and those perpetrating this fraud be punished. The present Commissioner of Pensions has repeatedly punished. The present Commissioner of Pensions has repeatedly called upon Senators and Representatives to assist him in exposing and preventing these things and has frequently received snubs and rebukes for it, but he is right.

From the Revolutionary war up to the civil war the pension policy of this Government has been one of liberality, and ought to have been and ought still to be. But after the civil war a new era dawned. Up to the beginning of this war the United States Government had expended for military pensions about $90,000,000 and had granted 65,500,000 acres of bounty land in recognition of military services. The pension list at this time consisted of some 10,700 persons, of whom 63 were soldiers of the Revolution and 2,278 widows of such soldiers. For the fiscal year ending June 2,278 widows of such soldiers. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861, $1,092,000 was paid out for pensions. Under the laws then in force the number of pensioners was decreasing at the rate of 500 or 600 each year. Seventy-five or eighty persons were sufficient to carry on the work in the Bureau. There would have been from this time a constant decrease in the annual pension payment. The civil war checked this tendency and opened the way to an expenditure for military pensions unsurpassed anywhere in any country upon the face of the earth, above the earth, or under it, and the war with Spain has only accentuated this tendency, having up to date from that war 50,000 applications for pension, of which about 5,000 have been passed, and of course these deserve the same consideration and were just as brave and patriotic as any other soldiers of any of the other wars.

Heretofore pension laws were disability provisions, restricted in their operations and allowances, but the scope of all these laws was soon broadened. In 1818, thirty-five years after the Revolutionary war, service pensions were granted to indigent soldiers of Fourteen years later a surplus in the Treasury, due to a high tariff on imports, opened the way for a further grant to a high tariif on imports, opened the way for a further grant to the survivors. In 1832 a pure service pension law was passed. The civil war prevented the granting of service pensions to the survivors of 1812 at as early a day as would have been, but the law was passed in 1871, supplemented by another act in 1878. In 1887 a limited service pension law was passed for soldiers of the Mexican war, and in 1892 for the soldiers of the Indian wars. But Mexican war, and in 1892 for the soldiers of the indian wars. But all pension legislation prior to 1861 is now of slight importance except for comparison. The pension policy of the Government, instituted anew since that time, was done at a time when feeling ran high, and all along from then up to now the two parties have vied with other in declarations of devotion to the old soldier and have rushed headlong over each other in adding to the pension roll and increasing pensions and allowing arrearages.

This practice has gone on now for over thirty-six years. From first to last the burden is increased. New laws providing for increase of pensions, and besides the laws providing for increase in bounty there have been passed laws reducing the evidence required to obtain pensions, and at the same time adding new and easier conditions for obtaining pensions and increasing them. Year after year the safeguards have been removed and the way to get a bounty smoothed and made easy, number of witnesses reduced, disability made less, and the gates gener-ally opened wider. Southern members, as a general thing, thought it useless to interpose objections and said nothing rather thought it useless to interpose objections and said nothing rather than to give a pretext to some waver of the bloody shirt and stir up strife against his people. And thus it is that this plundering of the Treasury has gone on with scarcely a remonstrance from anyone until the country has probably become indifferent to the extent and enormity of the, to say the least of it, extravagance on one hand and fraud on the other.

As I said in the outset, this is our common country, and the time has come when a member from the South may enter his propeople of the North and South are ready to listen to discussion. They are beginning to feel the burden of taxation and can be made to observe wherein the trouble comes. Southern members may venture to criticise the present mode of granting pensions and expose irregularities wherever existing. When the plain facts are brought face to face with the people, they will demand of their representatives some regulation of the loose way of doing business. You ask me for a remedy. I believe there ought to be a thorough revision and codification of all pension laws passed since 1861, with the great mass of rulings and decisions thereunder, comprising, you might say, two systems, viz, the general law and the law of June 27, 1890. Under the first there are fewer pensioners, dealing with disability and death resulting from service, applying to the future as the past.

It includes the war with Spain, Philippines, and any future war. Its beneficiaries are disabled soldiers, widows, orphan children, dependent fathers and mothers, and orphan brothers and sisters. The rate reaches as high as $100 a month for certain disabilities. This general law embodies a whole lot of laws passed for the last thirty years, too numerous to mention in a speech of only thirty minutes. No more generosity was ever shown by any nation upon the face of the earth, and it is not the law I object to, but the abuse of it, as has been so plainly shown in the very able report of the Commissioner of Pensions. The other system is the law of June, 1890, with its subsequent acts leading from it, more generous than the other system and embraces within its score more pensioners than are enrolled under all other within its scope more pensioners than are enrolled under all other laws taken together, pensioning soldiers, their widows and chil-dren where disability is not traceable to service origin, thus open-ing the way for nearly everyone who heard a gun fired during the war to get a bounty.

Think of it! Since 1866 the number of pensioners has increased Think-of it! Since 1866 the number of pensioners has increased from 126,722 to nearly 1,000,000 in 1901, and the expenditure from $15,000,000 to $140,000,000 since that year. During the present year the pension roll may be expected to exceed 1,000,000 names. There has been paid out since 1866 in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000. We have yet on the pension roll 4 widows and 5 daughters of the Revolutionary war, 1 survivor and 1,527 widows of the war of 1812, 1,686 survivors and 3,479 widows of the Indian wars, and 7,588 survivors and 8,109 widows of the Mexican war. wars, and 7,568 survivors and 8,109 widows of the Mexican war. Now, then, if we are paying pensions to widows and daughters of soldiers of the Revolutionary war one hundred and eighteen years after peace was made with Great Britain, if we are paying pensions to soldiers and widows of the war of 1812 ninety years after the end of the war, if we are paying pensions to soldiers and widows of the Indian and Mexican wars over fifty years after the end of the wars, must it not follow that we must expect to continue to pay pensions to the soldiers and widows on account of the civil war up to at least 1970 or later? And then begin with the Spanish war veterans, as I have said, who were as brave, as two ends as periodic as the soldiers of other ways and wa will true, and as patriotic as the soldiers of other wars, and we will be paying them pensions up to 2000 or later.

It will be a conservative estimate to say that we will pay in the next fifty years, at the rate we are going now, in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000. Adding this to what has already been paid we have a sum nigh on to $8,000,000,000, far exceeding the cost of the civil war. I believe in standing by the old soldiers who were true and brave, and their families after them, but however praiseworthy and deserving they may be, these sums of money seem to me to be extravagant and improvident from a business point of view. England has a standing army of nearly 200,000 men, to say nothing of her 100,000 in the navy. She has had wars, small or great, practically for fifty years past; she is the creditor nation of the world, and treats soldiers disabled in her service with great generosity, yet in the estimates for several years past her outlay for pensions for one year has never exceeded, in round numbers, $6,000,000, or, you might say, one twenty-sixth of the sum we pay. It may be asked, Why this difference? Let's see.

Of course, the United States is the greatest nation of all the nations, and I am proud of her standing. And I rejoice to know that the American soldier has outstripped all others in deeds of daring, heroism, and bravery the world over. But one reason assigned for it is said to be that the custom in the Old World is to give a medal to the rich who are disabled in their country's service. a medal to the rich who are disabled in their country's service.

Our custom seems to be to give the rich ex-soldier cold cash, and the richer he is the more cash he gets. In the Old World I am told that the poor, disabled ex-soldier gets the cold cash, and the poorer he is the more cash he gets. Here a poor private or his widow gets a mere pittance, while the rich brigadier or his widow must have even more than the law allows him or her, and when he must have even more than the law allows him or her, and when he or she fails at the Bureau, comes directly to Congress as a court of appeals and gets heeled. This is not right and ought to be changed. This reminds me of a rich father who called, his only son up and told him he was going to make his will and will him all his goods, but would make his Uncle Jim executor to the will to wind up the estate. The son listened to his father attentively till he finished, when he asked his son how he liked it. "Well, father," and when he asked his son how he liked it. said the son, "I like it all right if you will reverse the thing-turn it around." His father wanted to know what he meant. "Why," he says, "you just will all your goods to Uncle Jim and make me executor, and let me wind up the estate." [Laughter.] So that I think this pension policy ought to be reversed by giving money to the poor soldier and medals to the rich. I shall ever raise my voice and cast my vote for the men who stood in the trenches, in the forefront of the battle, bearing always the heat and burden

I suspect that if our pension rolls were carefully examined the fact would be developed that names of many would appear who have wealth, drawing large salaries, and yet drawing pensions for nave weath, drawing large salaries, and yet drawing pensions for total disability. I read somewhere some years ago a statement in one of our daily papers to the effect that at that time a chief justice in one of the Northwestern States was drawing a pension of $72 per month for total disability, with a salary of $4,000 a year, saying nothing of arrearages and property. I don't know as to the truth of it. the truth of it. In cases like this and others of like nature it is my humble judgment a medal would be just as honorable, and at the same time more agreeable to the taxpayers. Then it might be asked what remedy could be applied. As I have already said, the laws upon the subject ought to be revised and codified. In the next place, I believe and have long thought that a list of all persons drawing pensions from the Government ought to be published in book form, if it took dozens of volumes, stating the amount drawn and their disability, condition, and so on.

This would enable the public to better judge about these incongruities and inconsistencies. This might develop the fact that a good many are drawing large salaries and large pensions at the same time, and then it might show up some who are drawing pensions for total blindness who are acting as night watchmen, or some who are drawing pensions for total deafness who are running telephone lines, and many other things might appear running telephone lines, and many other things might appear along that line. I only speak of these as a sample. And I want to say just here, that of the thousand pensions granted by special acts, a large majority of them are without merit or justice.

Then, again, it might do some good to abolish pension attorneys, or sharks, as they are sometimes called, some of whom I notice are mentioned in the Commissioner's report as using fraudulent means to obtain a pension for another. The causes which led to the disherment supposition and drawning for cause number 24. the disbarment, suspension, and dropping for cause number 24, and are as follows:

These items are only a small number of such instances mentioned in the Commissioner's report this year.

Then provide that no one having adequate means of support should receive a pension, except where total disability existed or where a leg or an arm was lost; prohibit arrearage to remarried widows and to children after maturity except where idiocy exists; and prohibit young women who marry an aged pensioner especially for his pension from getting it; and last, but not least, forever prohibit the granting of any more pensions by special acts, except in only a few extreme cases, and never again remove the charge of desertion against a man who has waited till this late day by special act.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.
Mr. SULLOWAY. Is not the gentleman aware that under the law as it exists to-day no one of the ladies that he alludes to as marrying an old soldier would be entitled to a pension under the act of 1890? That act provides for those who married prior to that date.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman says that no woman will do thus and so. Why, Mr. Chairman, no living man can tell what some women around those Homes will do. [Laughter.] It has been said there is only one kind of a woman that will not marry, and that is a dead one. [Laughter.] A good woman I admire more than anything in the world, and I will assist any deserving more than anything in the world, and I will assist any deserving widow to get a pension. I have been speaking of those only who visit these Soldiers' Homes, as I have learned.

Mr. SULLOWAY. The law does not allow a pension to a widow who marries since 1890, living or dead.

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, but the law is avoided and is abused. They get around it in some way, and they go to the general law and get the pension by unscrupulous actions, false affidavits, etc. I will read the gentleman a clipping from the Chicago Tribune of December 22, 1897, which speaks of the conduct of some of these women at the Soldiers' Home: women at the Soldiers' Home:

PERJURY AND FORGERY.

Women at the Soldiers' Home:

PERJURY AND FORGERY.

How did the cheats and swindlers get on the lists? The answer made to that question by a pension official of whom it was asked was that they got on chiefly by perjury. They could get on in no other way. With most of the perjury there was forgery. In a rural community, where everybody knows everybody else, the Government is an easy mark. There are many persons who believe it is all right to cheat a railroad. If the conductor of a train does not ask them for a ticket they will not give it up. If they go to a store, offer a bill in payment for goods, and get more change than they are entitled to receive they pocket the change. If a bank clerk overpays them on a check they pocket the overpayment. There are many persons who think it is all right to do these things. There are more who think it is all right to do these things. There are more who think it is all right to do these things. There are more who think it is all right to the swindle and the cheats in the pension rolls. Here is an interesting page from one of the reports of Pension Commissioner William Lochren. It is headed "Popular feeling corrupted."

In some of these cases of systematic frauds and criminal practices by attorneys having each many thousands of pension claims the result has been to procure large numbers of fraudulent pensions and of undeservedly high ratings for persons in the neighborhoods of these attorneys, bringing every three months large amounts of money from the United States Treasury into these communities, which naturally passed into business channels and constituted an apparently large factor in the local prosperity. The fear that the conviction of these attorneys and their confederates and investigation of fraudulent pensions would lessen the influx of pension money has been manifested in popular rancor against the special examiners whose investigation of fraudulent pensions.

THE "WIDOWS."

Communities lost to shame, such as Mr. Lochren describes in this page of his report, are not rare, officials of the Pension Bureau to-day say. Here, then, are three shameless abuses, through the agency of which the Government is annually robbed of millions of dollars, and the pension rolls are padded with thousands of fraudulent names. There is another abuse more vicious even than the first two of these three that have been told about. This one is the pensioning of "widows" of veterans. It is a national scandal that Soldiers' Homes are the camping ground for females who seek pensions. They lurk about these Homes as wild animals lurk about the foot of a tree where their intended victim has taken refuge. This is no overdrawn picture, either. These females catch a veteran and run him away to a minister, who marries them. He islanded then back at the Home and the female departs in triumph. She need never see the man again. She has only to wait for him to die, when she assumes a widow's weeds and takes her place among the worthy widows of soldiers who lost their lives fighting for their country, though the veriest harlot she may be.

She is not pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, but under the general pension law. The act of 1830 provides that widows shall benefit who married the pensioners previous to the date of the passage of the act. The general pension law does not set any date for the marriage of a couple to enable a surviving widow to get her husband's pension. It is sufficient that she was married to him and is his widow. So notorious has this business of marrying veterans become that scarcely a month passes but something about it gets into the papers. Recently the Sun printed a dispatch from a town in the interior of Maine where the race for veterans was hot. Women scoured the woods for them and hunted them as a hunter pursues wild game. In Washington the Sun reporter was informed by an official of the Pension Bureau who knew that matters were almost as bad. "These women," said the official to the Sun persons can be got to testify about events that happened and conditions that existed years ago is well known. The statement is made without fear of contradiction that if the ordinary rules of evidence were enforced in pension cases as they are enforced in courts of record the pension rolls would contain fewer names of "survivors" and "widows" by more than a hundred thousand than they do now. So much for the pensions that are granted by general laws and by the dependent act of June 27, 1830.

This article speaks for itself. I do not vouch for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina, if he would not feel interrupted, that Congress has been very liberal in the matter of soldiers with charges of desertion against them. Congress passed a bill in 1889—I know it was after I came here—in which the largest liberality was extended to soldiers who had been mustered out with any discredit on their records.

All they had to do was to apply to the War Department with

All they had to do was to apply to the War Department with their evidence of mitigating circumstances, etc., and they were discharged with the utmost liberality.

Mr. TALBERT. I alluded to that act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, when the four years' limitation of that statute has expired some of these cases are coming up.

Mr. TALBERT. I alluded to that very act. I think there was, however, another and later act. I may be mistaken on that point.

By doing these things I am sure some good will come, and no honest, true, patriotic old soldier will in any way suffer by it. While we all desire to do justice to the old soldier who stood by the flag in the past, some provision ought at least to be made for those who are to save the country in the future. The pension roll should be a roll of honor. No deserving old veteran should be neglected. Extravagance and fraud should be guarded against as much for the old soldier as the taxpayer. I insert here a clipping showing the number of pensioners now enjoying our bounty in foreign lands:

There are 4,022 pensioners of the United States living in foreign countries, and the total amount paid them last year was $619,945. Canada has nearly one-half of them—1,981—who draw nearly one-half the total—$301,507. There are 788 in Great Britain, to whom $118,548 is paid annually: 621 in Germany, who received $94,547 last year; 99 in Mexico, receiving $15,198; 68 in Switzerland, 57 in France, 41 in Sweden, 39 in Norway, 38 in Australia, 28 in Italy, 27 in Austria, 24 in Denmark, 24 in Hawaii, 15 in China, 12 in the West Indies, 11 in Japan, 9 in Chile and New Zealand, 7 in Bermuda, 6 each in Argentine Republic, Peru, Turkey, and Madeira, 5 each in Cuba and Guatemala, 4 each in Costa Rica, Greece, Russia, and the South African Republic, 3 each in the Azores, Brazil, Colombia, Danish West Indies, and Honduras, 2 each in Algiers, Bahama Islands, Dutch West Indies, Finland, India, Malta, Nicaragua, Seychelles Islands, and Siam, and 1 each in British Guiana, Bulgaria, Comoro Islands, Ecuador, Egypt, Korea, Mauritius, Portugal, Roumania, Tahiti, and Uruguay. Now, it will be seen by this article that we are paying tremen-

Now, it will be seen by this article that we are paying tremendous bounties to foreigners, many of whom we hired to fight, and were fighters, as Paddy said, for "dirdeen dollars a month."

Now I want to say that if we can not reform our pension system in some or all of the ways enumerated, there is one thing we can do, and that is, put a stop to private special pension legislation in this House. It is a common phrase if a man can not get on the pension roll under existing law, he gets a special act passed putting him on; or if he fails to get an increase at the Bureau, why he gets it by special act. There are very many of them that are ungets it by special act. There are very many of them that are unworthy, brought by Congressmen from everywhere. I insert here a list showing number of special acts from 1861 up to 1901:

Congress.	Number passed.	Congress.	Number passed.

As I have already said, these special acts are usually passed to allow claims which have been rejected by the Pension Bureau, often because they are absolutely without merit. It is the habit of both Houses to set aside certain days—the night session having been abandoned by my obstructive tactics and persistent efforts—for private pension bills, passing special acts. Very few members pay any attention to the bills, and they are generally passed without a quorum. Occasionally some member does insist upon the presence of a quorum. I have endeavored to do what I could against this reckless way of doing business, and believe that I have blocked the way to the passage of many unworthy claims and finally succeeded in breaking up the Fridaynight sessions, where bills were poured through a hopper sometimes like corn at the mill. President Cleveland attempted to put a stop to this abuse by the use of his veto power. In his first term he vetoed over 200 of these bills. Grant was the only other President who used the veto power in this direction, he having vetoed four or five unimportant measures. I submit again that Congress is not the proper place to consider these matters. The pressure of general business is too great. There is no time for a discussion of these private claims. Again, I maintain that under our present system of pension laws, with their liberality, there are a very few meritorious claims that do not fall within their scope. Then I want to appeal to the members in all conscience to put a stop to this custom of passing special acts to suit special individuals. It is not right, it is not fair to the old soldier personally, and robbery to the taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that what I have said on this occasion has not been said from a feeling of sectionalism or prejudice, but from a sense of duty. I wanted to call the attention of the country and this House to the enormity of the expenditures to which this department has reached, and to ask that an investigation might be had in order to ferret out the extravagance and fraud and lop it off.

I know you can not accuse me of sectionalism when you consider that the late war with Spain has enlisted so many of our brave boys from the South, who will many of them some day need the bounty of the Government, and some of whom are already justly enjoying it. Ten thousand privates and 500 officers have perished in that war, and it has cost, in round numbers, $300,000,000. I am ready to stand by the true, brave, patriotic soldier boy who, in the pride and vigor of youth, wasted his health and shed his blood for freedom's cause, or who laid his life down upon his country's altar. But what I want to say again is that I will stand up against giving a bounty to bummers, camp followers, coffee coolers, deserters, and cowards. [Applause

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, for the first time in my life I desire to say something of a personal nature. In common with other members of the House I have been the subject of an attack made by five gentlemen, named Joseph W. Kay, Charles Burroughs, Isaac F. Mack, H. H. Cummings, and W. W. Eldridge, in a paper dated Cleveland, Ohio, September 12, 1901, in which the Speaker of this Heese 12, 1901, in which the Speaker of this House, the gentleman upon my left, and other Republican members of this House are seriously criticised because they failed to vote for House bill 5779, which I desire the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in every Executive Department of the United States Government and in each and every branch thereof, whether reached by competitive or noncompetitive examinations under the civil-service laws (in which case the rules and regulations affecting the same shall so provide), honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served as such between April 12, 1861, and August 26, 1865, and first after the aforementioned veterans of the civil war those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands, they being otherwise qualified, shall be certified and preferred for appointment to and retention in employment in the public service and for promotion therein. Age, loss of limb, or other physical impairment which does not in fact incapacitate shall not disqualify them, provided they possess the business capacity necessary to discharge the duties of the position involved; and persons thus preferred shall not be removed from their positions except for good cause, upon charges, and after a hearing.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HEPBURN. As originally introduced in the House, Mr.

Mr. HEPBURN. As originally introduced in the House, Mr. Chairman, the bill did not contain the following language:

And first after the aforementioned veterans of the civil war those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands, they being otherwise qualified.

That was an amendment inserted, as I understand, by the Committee on Civil Service Reform. The bill as approved by the authorities of the Grand Army of the Republic did not contain that language. It will be remembered that it was sought by the genlanguage. It will be remembered that it was sought by the gentleman from Ohio to pass this bill under a suspension of the rules. And when that method is adopted for passing legislation no amendment is possible; we must vote for the bill as a whole or against it; there is no possibility of a change. I saw fit to vote against that bill, as I would do to-day. No authority of the Grand Army of the Republic had ever asked for that bill. There was no committee authorized to approve of that bill. On the contrary, I am informed that the amendment was an amendment of the committee solely. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that kind of legislation.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? His statement is entirely correct as to the amendment on that bill having been inserted by the Committee on Civil Service Reform. But there was a committee, as we understood, of the form. But there was a committee, as we understood, of the Grand Army, consisting of Mr. Kay, a gentleman who has been mentioned by the gentleman from Iowa, and others who were here pressing the bill and in conference with members of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, who were in favor of the passage of the bill. The gentleman correctly says that the bill originally introduced and referred gave preference only to veterans of the civil war; but the Committee on Civil Service Reform, or a majority of them, insisted on including in the provisions of this bill the veterans of the Spanish war, and very reluctantly the minority of that committee consented to the amendment. This amendment, however, before it was finally reported to the House, was submitted to Mr. Kay and the gentlemen who were with him and submitted to Mr. Kay and the gentlemen who were with him and met their approval, or perhaps I should qualify that remark by saying they felt that, in order to get the bill through, it was necessary to accept this amendment of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, and to that extent they did accept the amendment and were satisfied to have the bill in that form come before the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me ask the gentleman whether he understood from that committee of the Grand Army of the Republic that they desired that were authorized to accept that amendment that they claimed they were authorized to accept that amendment or were authorized to urge the passage of a bill with that amendment in it?

Mr. BROMWELL. I will answer the gentleman by saying that it was the impression of those members of the Civil Service Reform Committee, of whom I was one—and the gentleman is well aware that it was I who introduced the bill in the House we did understand from that committee that their action would meet with the approval of the Grand Army, although the bill as presented, or rather as reported with the amendment, was not the original bill indorsed by the Grand Army.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have some serious objections to this bill as it was presented to this House. All gentlemen who are familiar with the facts will recognize this as the truth, that in the competitive examinations the soldier who is now given preference by law is required only to reach a standard of 65. If he reaches 65 in competition with a man not a soldier who may have reached 99 or 100, the name of the man with a rating of 65 must be sent up in response to a requisition.

Now, I was unwilling to add 275,000 men to the list of those who might have that advantage. Some men who were engaged in the late war are, in my judgment, entitled to the recognition that was properly given to the soldier of the war of the rebellion, but I am not willing that 225,000 men who were never beyond the limits of the United States and never heard a hostile gun fired should stand as a preferred class, from which for the next twenty-five years (if this bill should become a law) the entire civil servive could be from year to year recruited.

You put this legislation on the statute books of the United States, and what chance has any young man to get in the civil service who was not a soldier in one or the other of these wars?

Mr. Chairman, I was unwilling that that species of legislation should be enacted. I do not believe in it. I know of no service rendered by the great majority of the soldiers enlisted in the Spanish war and in the Philippine war that entitled them to that kind of recognition. Those men who were actually in the service, those of recognition. Those men who were actually in the service, those men who actually rendered service, who underwent the hardships belonging to the service and who faced the perils and sufferings connected with the service, as men must endure who participate in active war in the Army—I say that I was perfectly willing that they should have the advantages of this law. I thought and still think that they were entitled to it; but the other 225,000 men that were never beyond the limits of the United States and knew nothing of service except in the various camps throughout the country, I was unwilling that they should have that advantage.

But the condition that confronted us made it necessary that we should take this bill as an entirety. There was no opportunity under the pending motion to amend the bill. I had to vote for the bill or against it as an entirety. I had to take it as it was or not take it at all.

Again, sir, I am opposed to any legislation that gives to any man the right of promotion in the civil service simply because he served. After a man has entered the service, when there is an opportunity for the proper persons to determine his worth, whether he is entitled to promotion or to hold the position or not, another question is presented. But simply because he has served, simply because he is able to "hold on" and pass the average, or represented a little below the average selector as he served with that perhaps a little below the average, so long as he serves with that degree of efficiency, I claim that he is not entitled to be promoted over another man efficient, industrious, and able in every other respect. I do not believe, in other words, in promoting a man respect. I do not believe, in other words, in promoting a man simply because of the period in which he served. There is no necessity for it. I am opposed to it, therefore, for the reason that there should be those entitled to pass upon the matter and who can judge of the efficiency of the man and who have an interest in a correct judgment with reference to him.

I do not believe in legislating a man into office without reference to his fitness, even in the place where he is-I mean with reference to his retention. I do not believe in the statute which says because a man has in another field done well he shall be retained in service in this new or a particular field, regardless of present fitness. I do not believe in it. It is not in harmony with our system. I think that each man should stand upon his own individual merits, and that simply because of some former service in some other branch of the public business he ought not to insist upon his retention unless he retains himself through the efficiency of the service he now renders. And I do not believe that the Grand Army of the Republic at large have asked for this. It think it was legislation sought by certain interested persons now in office who were in the war, and who were afraid they were going out, and wanted to anchor themselves in new places while the opportunity presented itself. And I believe that they spoke or pretended to speak for the Grand Army of the Republic with-

I do not think it is necessary for me, Mr. Chairman, to say in this presence that I have on every occasion in all proper ways been the friend of my comrades. I simply speak now because of the studied effort of these five men I have named, who perhaps ignorantly, who perhaps not understanding the effect of the legislation, or perhaps for the purpose of justifying themselves in a failure through a mistake of their own in lugging in this-the amendment quoted-have attempted to screen themselves by mendment quoted—nave attempted to screen themselves by throwing dirt on their comrades.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part in the debate upon this bill, and would not now occupy the time of the committee except to reply in part to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, who has just taken his seat.

The bill as originally introduced and referred to by the gentleman was a bill which had been prepared by the Grand Army of the Republic of the United States. 'A committee was sent here to have the bill introduced and to attempt to secure its passage. It went to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and, as I said before, was in that committee amended so as to include the soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war.

Personally I was opposed to the amendment. I recognized the same difficulties to which the gentleman from Iowa has referred, that it meant the creation of a civil-service list with an immense number of eligibles, and that it would block the filling of civil places in the Government for many years to come.

But the Committee on Civil Service Reform insisted upon the amendment and the bill was so reported. Now, the gentleman has truly stated that this bill came up under suspension of the rules, and that it was impossible to amend it under the rules of the House. It had to be taken as it was or rejected as it was. It was no fault of the member of the Civil Service Committee who had no fault of the memoer of the civil sected and acted upon by the this bill in charge that it was not reported and acted upon by the this bill in charge that it was not reported and acted upon by the this bill in charge that it was not reported and acted upon by the House before the days under which suspension could be had. We endeavored to secure the consideration of this bill by the House in the ordinary way, but it was impossible to do so, and the only way in which we could get it before the House was under suspension of the rules. That was attempted, and, as gentlemen who were members of the last Congress know, it failed in the last days of the session.

I see no reason why this bill as originally presented might not be enacted into law. The old veterans of the civil war are rapidly disappearing. Their numbers are becoming fewer every year, and of the few who are left a still smaller number would probably ever take advantage of this law if it were passed. Very few ever would be in a position where they could make the application for this examination, and very few of those who make the application will probably be able to attain the 65 per cent. Now if they will probably be able to attain the 65 per cent. Now, if they could do so after the lapse of all these years, if they could make application for positions which they could fill, and the bill so provided, I see no reason why all the old soldiers of the civil war might not have the preference that now under law is given to the search old soldiers who are considered or disabled. The law as those same old soldiers who are crippled or disabled. The law as it stands to-day gives a preference to those who have been disabled. We wanted to extend the law so as to give to the Government service a better class of men by indig old soldiers who were not crippled or disabled by reason or

As to the promotion—

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow m.

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not this provision giving a reson who once gets in the right to promotion as a matter of right, is it not have to the old soldiers rather than otherwise, because of this a harm to the old soldiers, rather than otherwise, because of this a harm to the old soldiers, rather than otherwise, because of this fact? Here is a man who is fit for some minor position. His age to a certain extent incapacitates him, but there is a place in which he can serve. Now, if as a matter of right he may demand promotion, will not the officer having the right of selection discriminate against him? He would be willing to have him in a subordinate place, but not willing to have him in the place to which he might aspire, the place which he might attain by promotion. So that it seems to me that it is a harm to him rather motion. So that it seems to me that it is a harm to him, rather than a benefit, and will operate as a discrimination against him owing to this fact. And while the gentleman is upon that subject, will he give us his view as to what will be the status of the man who can not be turned out of office until after charges are preferred against him and after he has had a hearing? Does not that mean a trial? Does not that give him a vested right in that office that a court will protect? Will the gentleman give us his view with regard to that?

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not disagree to any great extent with the criticism which the gentleman makes on great extent with the criticism which the gentleman makes on the question of the promotion of those who might under this bill, if it became a law, be benefited. I think, with him, that the first consideration which should address itself to members of this House is the good of the service, the public good, rather than the private benefit to the old soldier or anybody else; and therefore, so far as that provision of the bill relating to giving preference in so far as that provision of the bill relating to giving preference in promotion is concerned, I will say to the gentleman that it never met with my hearty approval. I believe, after we have once opened the door to the old soldier and have given him a preference which places him in a position enabling him to secure a place, that he should hold that place and should receive his promotion from any place to which he is first appointed by reason of his capacity and fidelity. So that I fully agree with the gentleman in his criticisms upon that clause of the bill.

Now as to the status of a person holding a civil position under

Now, as to the status of a person holding a civil position under the Government, who is held in his place by law and can not be discharged without trial, charges, etc., the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] is quite as capable as I am to answer as to what the effect of such a law would be. I do not believe in holding in any public position a man who has become disqualified, either by reason of his habits or his mental, moral, or physical characteristics. I would be glad if there was a provision in the law by which either in the Civil Service Commission or in a separate board there should be reposed the power of calling every employee of the Government in a civil capacity before it for the purpose of making an examination upon his fitness, and if found unfitted for the public service that he should be summarily dismissed. If the civil-service law is to remain in force, I hope that some day we may have such a provision. These Departments in Washington and the public offices all over the country are filled with barnacles, with men who are incapacitated or unfitted to do the work, and until we get rid of them and put into their places men who are competent the civil service will always be a re-men who are competent the civil service will always be a reproach to the country.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what may be the fate of the bill to which the gentleman referred. I hope that it may be reintroduced in this House. I am informed that it is probable it will be; but I hope that it will come in as it was originally prepared and that it may pass the Committee on Civil Service Reform in that shape, so as to address itself to the conscience of this House and to show whether or not in this day and generation the soldiers of the civil war shall be treated generously, as they should be, by this great Government.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the general appropriation bill we have to-day heard a great deal about the "old soldier." I want to talk about another class of old soldiers, and I shall take the time at my disposal for the consideration of a bill I have to-day introduced on a subject closely allied to the appropriation bill now under consideration, and will say here that no one but myself is responsible for the bill or for what I shall say in its advocacy.

The first section of this bill is a duplicate of the bill I introduced in December, 1898, providing for the opening of Soldiers' Homes to disabled Confederate soldiers; and the second section provides that the National Government shall extend to State Homes at the South the same financial assistance now extended to the State Homes at the North and West. The following is the bill:

Beste Lionies at the Normand West. The following is the bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That from and after the passage of this act all Soldiers' Homes and other institutions maintained by the Government for the disabled soldiers and sallors of the United States shall be open to all soldiers and sallors of the civil war of 1861 to 1865 upon the same terms and without discrimination as to whether they were enlisted upon the side of the Union or the Confederacy.

(2) The benefit of the laws providing aid for Soldiers' Homes in the several States is hereby extended to those States which maintain or shall establish soldiers' homes for the veterans of the Confederacy, provided said homes admit Union veterans upon the same terms with the soldiers of the Confederacy.

Under ordinary circumstances, I would be content to await the action of the Military Committee, to which it has been referred, before asking the indulgence of the House while I give my reasons in its support. But practically the same bill was introduced by me in the House of Representatives in December, 1898, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, constituted then very much as it is to-day. The bill was never reported. Possibly, nay probably, the same fate awaits the bill now introduced by near the relief suggested proper and just I propose giving my lieving the relief suggested proper and just, I propose giving my reasons in its favor, and shall ask the chairman of the Commit-tee on Military Affairs for a hearing by his committee, and a vote on reporting it to the House.

The introduction of the bill in 1898 was followed by a good deal

The introduction of the bill in 1898 was followed by a good deal of comment and considerable criticism in the public press. Sentiment seemed divided not only in the North but South, and probably there was more unfavorable comment from the South than from any other section of the country. The criticism, however, was largely from those sources which profited by keeping up sectional feeling, or from those who were themselves then enjoying some benefits from the very Government which they thought should do nothing for their less-fortunate comrades. As I wish to be entirely fair, I now give a letter severely criticising me for introducing the bill.

Dear Sir: * * * I can not understand why you introduced that bill admitting the Confederate veterans to the Soldiers' Homes, etc. Had it come from some member from an unknown district it would not have been so significant, but you represent the Eighth Virginia district, a section that has furnished more fighting men in the late war than any in the South—Mosby's men, the Black Horse Cavalry, Seventeenth Virginia Infantry. Both of the latter organizations I had the honor to belong to—Kemper's battery—besides a number of famous men—Corse, Marye, Hunton, Payne, and a host of others. It will be presumed by the Northern people that you secured the opinions of the ex-Confederates upon this subject before you introduced your bill, and that the veterans who wore the gray are longing, wishing, and hoping for the bars to be put down and they can mingle with the fat kine of Egypt in the rich clover fields. It was in shocking bad taste.

I hope you will withdraw your bill. It puts us in the light of a ravening crowd of hackmen at a depot, ready at the beck of a finger of a passenger to rush forward and help themselves to all one could make. We don't expect pensions; and after trying with all our might and main to found a new government who would take care of us, and failed, and after years of effort to smash to eternal smithereens the United States Government, it ill beseems us to stand like beggars praying for the bounty that a generous government may give. To such a pitch of degradation the Southern soldier has not reached, thank God. We lost our fortunes, our futures, many our limbs, but we saved our pride, our honor, and our self-respect, and having walked erect so long, we don't intend to go to the grave with heads bowed and covered with shame. The men who fought the world in arms can never stoop to fawn and beg from a generous foe and ask to share with them that prosperity which we fought so hard to deprive them of. Please withdraw the bill.

Very truly, yours,

Taken by itself it would seem that this gentleman was horrified at the thought that some Confederate might receive some benefit or assistance from the Government he fought so bravely and honorably to destroy. But how does it appear when I state that the writer of that letter has for years been holding a position in one of the Departments of the Government in Washington at a salary of $1,200 per annum? He seems to have entered at the first gap, but now wants the bars kept up and other comrades kept out.

Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us To see oursel's as ithers see us!

In this connection I will state, and so informed the writer in my reply, that before introducing the bill I had consulted with one of the distinguished ex-Confederates named by him, Gen. Eppa Hunton, a gallant officer and a man who had distinguished himself in civil as well as military life, a former Representative in this Chamber and a United States Senator. He said the bill was right, and advised its introduction. Having given the above letter, so far as it concerns this bill, in full, except the signature, from the gentleman, who has been drawing a salary from the Government for a much longer time than he fought to destroy it, I now read a letter from a distinguished officer in the Confederate service—one who was promoted to a colonelcy in the closing days of the war for gallant services—a gentleman who has never drawn a select from the services—a gentleman who has never drawn a salary from the Federal Government, though he has held positions of honor and trust under his State, and is now judge of one of the courts:

Dear Sir: I think your bill for the admission of Confederate soldiers (disabled) into Soldiers' Homes for United States soldiers was introduced at an opportune time and came from a proper source, notwithstanding the fact that some of the newspapers think that we ought to have waited for some movement of the sort from our Northern friends.

The truth is that while I have not a word to say but in commendation of all that the President said in his Southern trip, * * * still I have not much appreciation of sentiment that does not manifest itself in some practical way. It is all very well to look after the graves of our dead, but it is a matter of much deeper concern to us of the South to provide for the poor, old, crippled, maimed Confederate soldiers and to make their last days comfortable as possible. I wish you success in your measure, but I am afraid that it will prick the bubble of sentimentalism and develop the fact that there is nothing in it when it costs anything. I have a kind of personal interest in the measure. I do not know but that I may have to go there myself some of these days, and I would like to fight the battles over again with the old fellows on the other side. I don't know of anything so well calculated to relieve the burdens incident to the last days of a man in life as to bring the old fellows together and let them fight over, with canes and crutches, the battles of their youth. Really, * * * if the Administration and party in power mean to do anything this is the most sensible, practical thing for them to do; but you will find that in getting your bill passed you will have a rough road to travel.

Another letter, which is from a Union man, I give in full. It

Another letter, which is from a Union man, I give in full. It breathes the true spirit of brotherly love:

Dear Sir: I am pleased to observe that you have introduced a bill in Congress to open the National Soldiers' Homes to Confederate disabled soldiers. I indorse it heartily. My sympathy was stirred a year or two ago by seeing an old Confederate soldier carried past my house on to the county poorhouse, and I have been thinking of the action you have taken ever since. I was all through the war an ardent Union man, and every pulsation of my heart was a prayer for success of the Union arms, and a Republican always since the war, but I want to see the last tinge of bitterness engendered by that strife eliminated and your bill made a law by the unanimous vote of Republicans and Democrats alike. DECEMBER 19, 1898

I am nearly 76 years old, and I thank God I have lived to see our country stored in heart and hand.
You have the honor to be the first to move in this, and you have my sincere tanks.

The following letter is from a valued constituent and a gallant officer on the Confederate side:

officer on the Confederate side:

Dear Sir: I take it I am not wrong in believing it would always be agreeable and encouraging to a Representative to have the cordial and emphatic indorsement of his constituents and knowing that accord exists between him and others on all important questions; so to this end I beg to trespass upon your valuable time to commend most warmly the resolution you recently introduced into the House granting to Confederate veterans, under like conditions, the same pecuniary advantages enjoyed by Union soldiers. Your able defense of the resolution against attack of the Richmond Dispatch leaves no argument to be used further in its support, as well as destroying every reasonable point made against it, leaving nothing but a threadbare, sickly sentiment to fill the aching voids and heal the pains and woes of the poor, old, infirm men who made history from '61 to '65.

Having been for several years commander of a camp of Confederate Veterans, I feel that I have had an opportunity of viewing their wants. Their absolute needs are in many instances unsupplied by or through aid and assistance that can be given them by their comrades, generally very little better off than themselves. This, I think, applies especially to county camps, though urban camps have resources and advantages that we of the county can not get; hence there are men now in our camp who, if measured by those elements that make a soldier, would touch elbows and dress right up alongside their former officers, many of whom hold high office and get big pay in the service of a generous and appreciative country. We do not object to this appreciation of our former officers since we gave them, as a rule, the political push that has put them in high places; on the contrary, "they do us proud" to know often we once served under them.

Also, the following from a man who never had his superior as a private soldier—one who, if he ever knew fear, never showed it. He never held office under State or Federal Government, and is to-day one of the most respected citizens of his State.

Is to-day one of the most respected citizens of his State.

JANDARY 13, 1899.

My DEAR SIR: Allow me to thank and commend you for the interest which you have taken (and proven) in our needy Confederate soldiers, those who contended for what they believed to be right, sacrificing health, property, and jeopardizing life in so doing.

In the first place, in my humble opinion, you deserved credit for presenting such a bill, demanding what you had a right as the representative of those who have shared their proportion of the tax for the support of such institutions for thitry-four years. And you deserve still more for the manly and independent spirit in which you have defended it.

It may be natural for those who have never experienced the horrors of the effects of war and the struggle for years to which so many of our noble men have been subjected (in order to support their families and themselves), to be so sentimental as to rely on the magnanimity of those who have taken delight in reminding us of our misfortune, but I feel assured that those who really need the care which your bill affords will have passed away, many, I fear, as many have, dying in need and poverty.

We have great cause to be grateful to an all-wise and merciful God for the ability which He has given us to take care of ourselves, but the time is now at hand when, in accordance with the laws of nature many who have not been so fortunate as to accumulate enough for a support in their declining days will be thrown upon the charities of the people or necessarily repair to the asylum of the pauper.

I can now recall the death of one of the braves, who fell upon the heights of Gettysburg in the glorious charge made by Pickett, who died at the almshouse in this county, and fills a pauper's grave; a man who was true to his country and fills a pauper's grave; a man who was true to his country and fills a pauper's grave; a man who was true to his country and fills a pauper's grave; a man who was true to his country and fills a pauper's grave; a man who wa

I fear that I shall weary, and did not intend writing so lengthily; but it is a subject of profound interest to me. Hoping that you and your family are well, and wishing you a prosperous and happy New Year.

I now give several letters from other sections of the country:

CHESTERTOWN, MD., December 19, 1898.

CHESTERTOWN, MD., December 19, 1898.

Dear Sir: I notice in the columns of the Baltimore American the introduction by you of a bill for the admission of Confederates, as well as Union soldiers and sailors, to all Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes and Government institutions maintained by the Government, and have to say in connection therewith, as a Republican and an ex-Federal soldier of 1861, that I heartily approve of your measure. * * * I regret, deeply regret, that you were not anticipated in this matter by some New England Republican statesman fifteen years ago. * * * I would not have you think that this is a new idea of mine, suggested by the recent utterances of President McKinley. For years I have advocated it.

No other prompting in this than a desire to do your people good, to show to you the friendly feeling of an ex-Federal soldier and the kind regards of a true American.

a true American.

Coalville, Utah, December 19, 1898.

Dear Sir: I see by the papers that you have introduced a bill in Congress providing that all ex-Confederate soldiers, disabled from infirmity, etc., be admitted to the National Soldiers' Homes the same as ex-Union soldiers. Permit me, a son of an ex-Union soldier who fought under the command of the gallant Dick Oglesby and the gallant John A. Logan, to say that I hope such a bill will soon become a law. I have been thinking of this very matter now for several weeks, and when the people of Atlanta gave President McKinley such an ovation a few days ago, I could wait no longer, but wrote to General Henderson, of Iowa, and suggested that he, being the most prominent ex-Union soldier in the House, introduce a bill similar to the one you seem to have introduced. I congratulate you on the introduction of this bill, and sincerely hope it or a similar one will, before the expiration of the life of the present Congress, become a law.

I can only give a few of the comments by the newspapers on the As an exponent of the criticism, I give what the Richmond Dispatch, one of the leading papers of Virginia and of the South, had to say on the subject under date of December 22, 1898:

OUR TRUE POSITION.

OUR TRUE POSITION.

The Dispatch can not approve the course of those Southern members of Congress who have made moves looking to Federal aid for disabled Confederate soldiers. They mean well, but err in judgment, we think.

If there is any substantiality in the President's fraternity policy, it is for him and his political associates to inaugurate it. It would be foolish and ungracious, too, for us to interfere with their plans. An unsolicited gift is of far more value than one obtained by hinting or actual begging.

As yet the President has committed himself no further than to express the belief that the time has come when the Government may well join the people of the South in caring for the graves of the Confederate dead. Precisely what he means, or how far he would go, we do not know; but no doubt his utterance upon this subject was well considered before he left Washington.

We presume that the help he would have the Government offer would be in the way of providing money to inclose and keep in order, for all time, the cemeteries where our dead lie buried; in other words, that our cemeteries should be put upon nearly the same footing as national cemeteries. If so, our scattered dead would be gathered into such cemeteries as Oakwood and Hollywood, and the "soldiers' sections" of those cemeteries would become the objects of the country's care.

The spirit of the President's speech forbids the idea that he thinks we of the South have been derelict in any wise in our duty to our fallen heroes, but it seems that he would have the Government show its appreciation of the valor of our men by helping us in some way in our work. How he does not say. Therefore, Southern Congressmen would better await the unfolding of his plans. No doubt he first wishes to test public sentiment in the North, and this he may soon do, as we see that some Grand Army of the Republic posts have already taken action approving his suggestion. There are, however, some notes of discord. Some of the New England papers emphatically antagonize th

I felt it proper to reply, under date of December, 1898, to this editorial as follows:

Editors Richmond Dispatch:

Editors Richmond Dispatch:

Your comments upon the bill recently introduced providing for opening Soldiers' Homes to disabled Confederates, as well as Union soldiers, tempt me, contrary to my usual custom, to reply. You deprecate a Southern member taking any steps in that direction. You say "an unsolicited gift is of far greater value than one obtained by hinting or actual begging." Evidently you and I look at this matter from vastly different standpoints. You say it is a gift. I say that it is a right. Upon your premises it might be well to wait the donor's pleasure, if you never got it. From mine it is our right not only to suggest, but demand. Citizens of a common country, with equal right before the law and the last discriminating statute as to holding office having been repealed, the ex-Confederate is required to pay taxes and has the right to vote and to represent his people in the highest offices under the Government. Is he to be classed as a beggar if he insists on equal privileges in other respects? Why give him the right to represent his people in the halls of legislation, as ministers to foreign countries, upon the Federal bench, and yet class him as a beggar if he insist hat Soldiers' Homes supported by the Government should likewise be open to him?

Summing up the situation, you say in conclusion, "So, upon a review of the whole situation, our true policy would appear to be one of masterly inactivity."

This has been our policy for thirty-three years, and more than the life of

This has been our policy for thirty-three years, and more than the life of a generation has passed since the close of the civil war.

How long is this "masterly inactivity" to continue? For another generation? Who then could be benefited?

These Soldiers' Homes are supported by taxes paid as well by the South as by the North—by the Confederate as by the Union veteran.

Since the declaration of war with Spain, it has been the favorite cry that sectionalism was dead and that the ex-Confederate should receive the same consideration in appointments to the Army as the Union veteran. Wheeler, Fitz Lee, and others have been accorded high positions by the President in the Army of the United States volunteers. The people of the South requested this should be done, and it was understood at the very outset that fair treatment would be accorded the South.

Why is it becoming in us to insist that our ex-Confederate generals should be given high commands in the United States Army, and yet preserve a "masterly inactivity" as to the men who really appeal most to our sympathies—the crippled, the maimed, and disabled? Why should it be unbecoming or in bad taste for a Representative in whose district many of these men live to suggest by bill that it would be an act of justice and an evidence of fraternity, indeed, to throw open the closed doors of the Government Soldiers' Homes to the disabled ex-Confederates?

It is right that it should be done. It should have been done sooner, and, being right, I do not see any impropriety in its introduction by a Southern Representative.

The bill was not introduced without consideration. During the summer recess, after consultation with a few friends, I decided to introduce a bill for the purpose. It was actually prepared before the delivery of the President's speech in Atlanta. Upon reading what he had to say, I thought it an opportune t

The Fredericksburg Free Lance, under date of January 12, 1899, said:

Ex-Congressman Gaines, of the Petersburg (Va.) district, Republican, is now a department clerk here, appointed, it is said, by order of the President, with whom he served in the House.—Washington correspondent Alexandria Gazette.

with whom he served in the House.—Washington correspondent Alexandria Gazette.

This accounts for the milk in the cocoanut. Mr. Gaines is out in a letter opposing the pensioning of Confederates. Mr. Gaines, it seems, has a Government job and does not feel the need of such a law. When those who are poor, needy, and deserving oppose such a law. When those who are poor, needy, and deserving oppose such a law, the Free Lance will be disposed, possibly, to change its opinion on the subject. In last Sunday's Dispatch Grand Commander Williams, of Winchester, of the Confederate Veterans, says:

"In a recent letter to me from one of your distinguished past grand commanders occurs this passage: 'Our comrades are getting old, and many poor, with the sharp competition of life hard to meet. This makes me sad.' To it I replied: 'Like you, my dear Colonel, it makes me sad when I consider how our comrades, especially those who, having so bravely struggled against adverse fortune to make their own living so long as health and strength sufficed, are fast becoming dependent."

The foregoing is a powerful indorsement of Congressman Rixey's bill to put these old, deserving, and dependent ex-Confederates in the United States Soldiers' Homes, which the Dispatch opposes, and yet The Free Lance does not understand that the Dispatch opposes, and yet The Free Lance does not understand that the Dispatch points out any better or more practical mode of providing for them. This appeal issues, too, from Winchester, where its Turner Ashby Camp, if we mistake not, opposes the Rixey bill.

Well may the poet call for 'strength to bear his portion of the weight of care that crushes into dumb despair one-half the human race." Scratch an opponent of putting the old Confeder in Soldiers' Homes and you'll be apt to find someone who has not felt the flerce pang of hunger or the depression of wart, and Commander Williams's appeal seems to indicate a growing lack of interest in and attention to the Confederate camps on the part of the veterans themselves

Many other comments by the journals of the country for and against the measure could be given, but I think the foregoing from the Dispatch very fairly represents the criticism against it. Several Confederate camps passed resolutions against the bill. Old Confederates took opposite sides, for and against. One communication, in a local paper, signed "Confederate," said:

munication, in a local paper, signed "Confederate," said:

No doubt this move was partly brought about by the beautifully expressed words of the President in his tour of the South, where he was received with all the hospitality of a warm-hearted and generous people and who gave him a most fitting reception in honor of his exalted position as President of the United States. His words have already met with condemnation from his own party press, for one Republican member of Congress expressed himself, "Before I give my vote for the bill I will wait to see if the President was in earnest and honest in his remarks."

There has been a good deal of sentimentalism expressed in the last five or six months in praise of the South, but go North and you will find the same old feeling about our people. Now that we have worked out our own salvation in these thirty years since the war, let us continue to do so unto the end, for with us it can not be long before we will answer the last roll call, and the bounty of aid is offered too late for good.

In this communication I think I have expressed the views of many of my comrades of the South, and am sure when they come to reflect they will echo the same sentiment of no mingling in the same Homes.

CONFEDERATE.

CONFEDERATE.

Another communication in the same paper, and also signed "Confederate," replying to the above, held that the bill was right, and said:

Yes, sir, Mr. Rixey, "the goodness of your heart" prompted the bill, and many an old Confederate soldier and sailor would thank you the balance of their days if you can be so fortunate as to effect its passage and give them a chance to "avail themselves of such a privilege."

Confederate says. "They would point out to him the trophies of their valor, etc." Could not the honest Confed point out to him or to them, as the case may be, the tracks they left behind them (with their heels toward Richmond) from the battles of Bull Run and Manassas toward Washington, and ask them where their "valor" was in those days? And were there no guns nor standards captured from them as trophies at that and at many other battles the Confed could think of if his memory was jogged a little?

CONFEDERATE.

And so it went. It is unnecessary to make further citations from the many comments of that time. It would only make "confusion worse confounded." The question, after all, is, Is the "confusion worse confounded." The question, after all, is, Is the bill meritorious, and does it deserve favorable Congressional action? The Federal Government provides "Homes" for the disabled volunteer soldiers under laws passed by Congress, the organization being known as the "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," which is now made up of eight separate "Homes," known as "Branches of the National Home," the requirements for admission to which are, first, an honorable discharge from the United States service; second, disability which prevents the applicant from earning his living by labor, with a proviso that a pensioner who gets as much as $16 per month can not enter except for special reasons.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes. Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You were referring to a bill that you introduced in 1898, were you not?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That bill provided, did it not, for receiving Confederate soldiers into the Homes?

Mr. RIXEY. The bill simply provided that the Soldiers' Homes should be opened to the Confederate soldiers as well as the Union soldiers.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. By what means were the Confederate soldiers to be admitted—upon what test, and who was to apply the test?

Mr. RIXEY. Upon the same test that is applied to the Union soldiers: First, that they were unable to maintain themselves that was the chief requisite—and then that they had been honorably discharged soldiers, either of the Confederacy or the Union. Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Have you such a bill before

Mr. RIXEY. That bill died with that Congress.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It has not been reintroduced in this Congress, has it?

Mr. RIXEY. It was not reported from the committee, but I have prepared another bill, which I introduce to-day, which provides that Soldiers' Homes shall be opened to Confederate as well as Union soldiers, and provides furthermore that the Government will give to State Homes at the South the same financial assistance that it gives to State Homes at the North and West; that is, $100 for every inmate of the State Soldiers' Home, just as is now given for the support of the Union soldier. This would give every disabled Confederate soldier the benefit of a Home to which

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If the gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him, of course I very cordially indorse that kind of a bill, and I do it as an ex-Confederate soldier. My first official act as a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress was to introduce a bill for a Home at Huntsville, Ala., for both Confederate of the confederate erate and Union veterans, and I have reintroduced into this Congress the same bill, heartily indorsed by the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Huntsville, Ala., and by the Confederate organizations of the same city, and indorsed by a memorial from the general assembly of Alabama.

Mr. RIXEY. I am glad to know the gentleman has introduced

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And I believe the time will come in the history of this country when the passage of such an act will procure the sincerest consummation of reconciliation between the two sections of the country.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman object to the States doing as they are doing now all over the South for the Confederate soldier?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not object to the States of the South doing what they are able to do; but I do believe, in accord with the sentiment Mr. McKinley expressed at Atlanta, that the time will soon come when the Federal Government will take care of the graves of the Confederate soldiers; and, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gaines] will allow me to suggest it, if the Federal Government can take care of the graves of our honored and lamented dead Confederate soldiers, it can also provide that those who are disabled by age and wounds and honorable poverty be taken care of in the Soldiers' Homes of the Government.

We pay our part of the taxes to furnish the brave Federal soldiers their pensions. Why not let the Government provide for our aged comrades of the South?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me a ttle further? Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to ask little further? the gentleman from Alabama a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I gather from what you say—Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Virginia.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Virginia yields to me to ask you this question. I gathered from what the gentleman from Alabama said a few minutes ago that if such a bill as this became law, it would bring about a friendly feeling such as has not been before between the different sections.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think so.
Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Am I to infer from this that there is an unfriendly feeling between the two sections of the country when there is none, and that if there is not a friendly feeling now that that can be remedied by giving these old Confederate soldiers a place in the Soldiers' Homes? What objection does the gentleman see to the Confederates being taken care of as they are in the States of the South now?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Do you object to the Federal Government taking care of the old disabled Confederate soldiers?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have not decided on that. I have not fully considered the question. With the lights before me now I do not think I am in favor of it, nor have my people asked me to act one way or the other; but I am in favor of the South taking care of their Confederate soldiers, the same as the State of Tenessee is doing, and as it is being done in Alabama, I think, and I aided all I could in the passage of that law.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Alabama is doing it to the extent of its financial capacity.

Mr. RIXEY. I think the gentleman from Alabama is right; and I will also say that each State in the South is taking care of the disabled Confederate soldiers to the best of her ability, and I believe in the wisdom of the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama in contradistinction to the position of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not think there has ever been any trouble between the old Confederate soldier and the Federal soldier. There never would have been any friction if they had been allowed to control. There has always been the greatest cordiality and friendly feeling between the soldiers who met on the battlefields of the great war between the North and the South.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, in addition to these, another Branch of the National Soldiers' Home is now being established at Johnson City, Tenn. For the maintenance of these Homes there has been paid by the National Treasury $40,796,723.34, and for construction and repair $10,274.714.25.

In additional to these National Homes, 9 in number, the Federal Government, by law, contributes $100 for every inmate of all the State Homes for United States soldiers. According to the report of the president of the Board of Managers, there were in 1900 30 of these State Homes in 27 States of the North and West, 8 of which Homes were established within five years, and for the support of which the Federal Government contributes $100 per annum for each inmate, less one-half of the amount which may be deducted from pensions.

The average cost per capita is lowest in Illinois, $105.03, where the Home had 1,528 inmates.

For the year ending June 30, 1902, the estimate of appropriations is $3,087,694 for the Government Homes, and $950,000 for aid to State or Territorial Homes, making a total for the year of $4,037,694.

Twenty-nine thousand five hundred and seventy-eight mempers were cared for in 1900 in the 8 Branches of the National

Home, and 16,701 in the 30 State Homes. A total of 46,279.

The annual cost per capita for maintenance in the National Homes is $123.97, as against an average of $159.37 in the State

It is presumed that the greater portion, if not all, of the inmates of the Homes draw pensions, a portion of which, in some of the State homes, is covered into the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, no one can deny that the Federal Government has been and is generous to her soldiers and sailors.

Out of a possible 965,813 survivors, it is estimated that about 80 er cent are now carried on the pension rolls, and that nearly $150,000,000 is annually appropriated for pensions, making a total since the close of the war of $3,222,808,116.26, which has increased from the yearly average expenditure of $28,651,273.02 in the first year of Grant's Administration to $140,000,136.81 in the last year of McKinley's first Administration.

In addition there are, as I have stated, 8 Soldiers' Homes supported entirely by the Federal Government, and 30 State soldiers homes, for the support of which the National Government contributes $100 for every inmate.

Without stopping now to question or criticise this great expenditure of money, which does not seem likely to grow less in the near future, because of our large standing Army, foreign wars, and military establishments, I desire to call attention briefly to what is done for the Confederate soldier.

The National Government, of course, contributes nothing to his support or maintenance, but the several Southern States have, to the extent of their ability, contributed to the comfort of those unable to maintain themselves.

(1) Maryland has no general pension law for the Confederate soldier, but appropriates $9,000 for a Confederate Soldiers' Home, which is further assisted by private contributions.

(2) Virginia maintains a Soldiers' Home at an expense of $35,000

(2) Virginia maintains a Soldiers' Home at an expense of $35,000 and appropriates $135,000 for pensions. The highest pension for total disability from wounds is $30 per year.

(3) North Carolina maintains a Soldiers' Home upon an appropriation of $10,000, and by a special tax of 3\frac{1}{2} cents on the $100 of property provides a pension fund of about $112,230, disbursed as follows:

111 first class, at $58 per annum 358 second class, at $43.50 per annum 619 third class, at $20 per annum 2, 336 fourth class, at $14.50 per annum	$6,438 15,573 17,951 33,727
2,658 widows, at $14.50 per annum	38,541

Here we see that out of a total of 6,072 pensioners, 4,984 draw only $14.50 as an annual pension. It is only paid to those who have no other support. Can mortal man exist on it? It is a fair sample of pensions in other States, as I believe.

(4) South Carolina has no Soldiers' Home, but appropriates $150,000 for pensions.

(5) Georgia appropriates $20,000 for a Soldiers' Home and $800,000 for pensions

(6) Florida maintains a Soldiers' Home and appropriates about $3,250 for pensions, which is provided for by a special tax on property. If the amount collected is insufficient, pensions are prorated.

(7) Alabama provides no Soldiers' Home, but has a special tax to be used as a pension fund for those who are unable to earn their living and have not as much as $400 worth of property or an income of that amount, the fund being prorated if insufficient.

(8) Mississippi maintains no Soldiers' Home, but appropriates $150,000 annually for pensions for those unable to support themselves and who have not as much as $400 in property.

(9) Louisiana maintains a Soldiers' Home, with 140 inmates, upon an annual appropriation of $18,200, and appropriates $50,000

(10) Texas maintains a Soldiers' Home, with about 300 inmates, upon an annual appropriation of about $40,000, and now appropriates $150,000 for pensions. No person can draw a pension who is an inmate of the soldiers' Home or who is able "to earn a support."

(11) Arkansas maintains a Soldiers' Home and provides pensions of the maximum amount of $100 in a single case, provided neither the applicant nor his wife has as much as $400 in property or income of $150 and is not an inmate of the Soldiers' Home.

or income of $150 and is not an immate of the Soldiers' Home.

(12) Tennessee has a Soldiers' Home and appropriates therefor $100 for each inmate. It also provides $150,000 for pensions.

(13) Missouri seems to pay no pensions to Confederates, but since 1897 maintains a Soldiers' Home with an annual appropriation of $30,000. The Home has something over 160 inmates.

It will be seen from the above that all of the States mentioned, except Maryland and Missouri, provide to some extent for pensions to disabled Confederates, with the limitation that only those unable to earn their living and who have not sufficient property for support shall be entitled to the meager pension allowed.

All the States named, except South Carolina, Alabama, and Mississippi, have Soldiers' Homes, which are in many if not all cases inadequate to accommodate all who would enter.

The State of Missouri maintains two Soldiers' Homes, one for the dischled Union soldiers and one for the dischled Union soldiers and one for the dischled Union soldiers and one for the dischled Union soldiers.

the disabled Union soldiers and one for the disabled Confederates. For the Union Home the National Government contributes $100 for every inmate; but for the Confederate Home not a penny, though the inmates are equally disabled, equally chivalrous, and appeal equally to our sympathies. Private contributions, instead of aid from the National Government, have to be resorted to for aid to the State appropriations. The discrimination is wholly univer

You see, the superintendent says we have an infirmary in which every inmate has a surgeon's certificate, under eath, that he is unable to make a living by his own exertions; no others can be admitted under the law. Neither the doctors nor citizens of the State have a just conception of the condition and necessities of these patriotic old men, who gave their young manhood to the defense of the South. And with all their faults (and none of us are perfect), are entitled to the very best care the State can give them.

The condition of the South at the close of the war is too well known to need description here. With their slaves, which had been property, freed, entailing a loss of many millions of dollars, lands devastated, houses and fences destroyed, and personal property of all kinds all gone; railways torn up and civil institutions subverted and placed in irresponsible hands; with the most intelligent of her population disfranchised and suffrage given without preparation to millions of illiterate voters—what could she do? With credit impaired or destroyed, in many instances the States staggered under great State debts, the obligations of which they have honestly striven to meet.

These debts had been contracted upon the faith of the property

These debts had been contracted upon the faith of the property of the several States, the total loss and destruction of much of which was not all they had to bear, for they have not only had to meet the debts, public and private, as if the property still existed, but for thirty years and more they have voluntarily taxed the lands and property still left the citizens to educate and fit for citizenship the children of these ex-slaves. It is a question whether there was not a higher children much the States to have whether there was not a higher obligation upon the States to have been more generous in their support of the Confederate soldiers and of the widows and orphans of the war, many of whom have suffered, even if it necessitated being less bountiful to the

In addition, the government of the negro has been more costly than that of the white man. In Virginia, where the whites largely outnumber the negroes, there are now in the penitary of that State, according to a statement in an editorial of the Warrenton State, according to a statement in an editorial of the Warrenton Virginian of January 9, 1902, 889 negro men to 173 white men. The turning loose at the close of the war of the many millions of negro labor throughout the South acted almost as a complete barrier to the immigration to that section of white labor from European countries. These immigrants did not wish to compete with such labor, and as a consequence were forced to the North and West to-aid materially in building up those great Commonwealths. It is not putting it too strongly to state that if the Federal Government had been as generous in its treatment of the Southern ernment had been as generous in its treatment of the Southern States as the Southern soldiers have been in the education and care of the negro, the discriminations against the Confederate soldier would long since have ceased to exist.

Besides these obligations and burdens which they have had to

Besides these obligations and burdens which they have had to assume and meet at home, the Southern States have had to pay immense revenues to the National Government as special taxes on liquors, tobacco, and other products, and while citizens in the States of Ohio, Indiana, New York, and Pennsylvania have for years received annually in pensions from the National Government sums varying from over fifteen millions in Ohio to ten millions in Indiana, but little of the vast sums paid by the Southern States ever returned to them in pensions.

With these drains more the South she has done and is doing as I

With these drains upon the South she has done and is doing, as I have already shown, what she can to care for her maimed and disabled soldiers. They are rapidly passing away—more rapidly, perhaps, than the Northern soldiers—and in another generation there may not be a single survivor. Can we not do something now, thirty-five years after the close of the war, to show that the era of good feeling and brotherly love does indeed exist—with no North or South, East or West, but one united country—with no prejudice against the private soldier, as there seems to be none against the commanders? No one asks or expects pensions for the Confederate soldier, but can not the National Government open every Government Soldiers' Home, and, if necessary, build others, and welcome the old Confederate soldier in his declining years to a hospitality as unbounded and generous as all brave men should extend one to the other?

In addition, let the National Government extend to the State Homes at the South the same financial assistance it extends to the

We do not suggest or ask this as a charity, but as an act of justice, equality, and right, just as we insisted, when the South reentered the Union, that the Confederate soldier should have the ballot, with the right to hold office. In this light I, as a Southern Representative, not only suggest, but demand it. If not accorded, it will be from sheer power and narrow prejudice.

Some insist that the old Confederate will not take advantage of the National Homes if opened to him. If so, the tender will do no harm and entail no cost on the National Government, which will have extended an invitation to all without discrimination.

If the invitation should be generally accepted and acted on, the National Government could well afford the additional expense in the increased good feeling and assurance of a duty well performed. I am one of those who hold to the belief that the old Confederate would soon feel at home in the Government Soldiers' Homes. He would have the same right in these Homes, supported by the common taxes of the country, as others. He would call it his home, and ample provision would be made.

If the Confederate should accept the benefits of the Soldiers' Homes in the same proportion as the Union soldiers do the National and State Homes, the number would still not be very great. It is impossible to accurately estimate the number from any present comparisons, because the inmates of the Soldiers' Homes are of the Spanish as well as civil war, but the comparison for the purposes of approximation may be made. The Record and Pension Office estimates the number of survivors of the Union Army in 1890 at 1,285,471, of whom, in 1890, 16,783 were cared for in the National Homes and, in 1896, 7,755 in the State Homes, making a total of 24,138. This is less than 2 per cent of the whole number of survivors. Let us apply this same per centum to the survivors of the Confederate armies.

The Interior Department, Document 135, Fifty-fourth Congress. first session, estimates the whole number of survivors of the Confederate veterans, June 1, 1890, at 432,020, and 2 per cent of this number would give 8,640 as the number of those who would probably take advantage of the Government's provision for the Soldiers' Homes; but as with a diminishing number of Union veteran Survivors the numbers in the Government and State Soldiers' Homes had increased from 24,000 in 1890 to 46,000 in 1900, we may suppose that 15,000 would more nearly be the proper estimate for the Confederates. More or less, it matters not if the principle

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.
Mr. SIMS. What difference in principle could there be in pay-Mr. SIMS. ing the Confederate soldier money with which he might live with his friends and relatives at home and spending the same amount of money in maintaining a public establishment?

Mr. RIXEY. I think the distinction between the two can be very well drawn, although it may not be entirely clear. Under the general law a man can not go into the Government Home unless he is so disabled that he can not earn his living by his labor; but to draw a pension a man does not have to be disabled. And we all know that many people draw big salaries and also draw pensions. There is a vast difference between the Soldiers' Home, where you can only go if you are unable to earn a living by your labor, and when you have no property to support your-, and the case of a pensioner.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the gentleman to say that he was opposed to giving pensions to Confederate soldiers.

Mr. RIXEY. I did not say I was opposed to it. I said that no pension was asked for Confederate soldiers.

Mr. SIMS. The act giving them a pension could be limited to giving only those a pension who are unable to maintain themselves otherwise.

Mr. RIXEY. We all know about these pensions. We remember the case of a judge in Wisconsin drawing a salary of over the case of a judge in Wisconsin drawing a judge in Wisc $5,000, as I am informed, yet drawing a pension of $70 a month, and appealing from the ruling of the Commissioner because he was not allowed more. I am informed—I do not know as to the correctness of it—that there are members of this House who draw their salary as members of Congress and yet draw pensions.

Now, there is a great difference in the case of people who have sufficient property to support themselves in affinence and the man who has nothing to support himself and is unable to earn his

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentlemen allow me an inquiry?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I have always understood that there was a principle underlying the granting of pensions. For instance, all service pensions were justified on the ground of compensation and disability and dependent pensions on the ground of obligation of the Government to take care of those disabled in its service. Upon what principle, if any, does the gentleman rest his bill to maintain the Confederate soldiers in Soldiers' Homes, which in principle, it seems to me, is the same as that of the pension.

Mr. RIXEY. I am sorry my friend does not understand me, and it is hardly worth while for me to go over it again. I stated the fact that 80 per cent of the survivors of the civil war were on the pension roll, and only about 2 per cent in the Soldiers' Homes. Gentlemen can see that there is a wide-margin between the admission of the Confederate soldier to the pension roll and his admission to the Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I am not speaking about the facts. I am speaking about the principle that underlies the proposition.

Mr. RIXEY. I stated that while the distinction may not be a very broad one, there is a distinction between the two.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Would not the gentleman's bill destroy any distinction there is?

any distinction there is?

Mr. RIXEY. I think not. It does not provide for a pension, but for the relief of the disabled soldier.

Mr. SNODGRASS. If the Government has the power to do that, would it not destroy the principle?

Mr. RIXEY. The Government has the power to pension everybody if it chooses to do so. The question is not as to the power of the Government, but what Congress will do.

In my own county I know of a number of ex-Confederates who are living with ther relatives and friends, and I doubt not the same condition exists throughout the South. These ex-soldiers would feel freer and more independent if they had a Government Home of their own to which they could go as a matter of right. I think they are entitled to it, and I am willing to brave criticism from my own people, if it, must come, in order to secure it. A greater sacrifice would be cheerfully borne if I had the assurance that the veterans who had sacrificed all except honor upon the altar of patriotism, now disabled by wounds, disease, or age, should all have comfortable Government Homes in their old age.

Many other ex-Confederates, without homes or friends to support and care for them, are now, in the declining years of their lives, compelled to labor when they should be resting. It is to their credit and honor that they meet this responsibility, as they have met others, with a manly, courageous, and honest effort to provide for their families and themselves. I give one instance which comes under my own observation. It involves no discredit, and I give the name and facts. From Brandy Station, near which place I live, to Carrico Mills, a distance of 3 miles, the mail is daily carried by Addison Embrey, under a contract with the Government, for which he receives the yearly compensation of $90. This, with $30 which he receives from Virginia as annual pension for total disability on account of wounds received in battle, is his sole support for himself and aged wife. Mr. Embrey is 70 years of age, almost deaf, and, having no means with which to buy a horse, for many months walked and carried the mail upon his back in all kinds of weather.

Another Confederate living in the neighborhood, who had but one horse, and that an old one, told the carrier, Mr. Embrey, to take his horse, as he had more use for it than the owner. This mail carrier, I have said, was a Confederate soldier. He is an illiterate man, unable to read or write, but forty years ago he was a gallant soldier, as he is even now making a gallant fight for life. He was in some of the great battles of the war, the last in which he participated being the battle of Seven Pines, where he had his shoulder shattered and was otherwise desperately wounded. He was carried from the field, as was thought, to die, but recovered, as many other wounded heroes did, to go through life

There are others like him—many others. Well might the eloquent young Georgian, Henry Grady, say:

The Lord God Almighty laid the sword of knighthood on the shoulder of every man who wore the gray.

A short time since, and after I had prepared this bill, an old gentleman came to my residence in this city. I had known him for many years. He had in years gone by lived in the same county with me. He was a Confederate soldier; was wounded four times, once by a sabor cut across the face, once by a bullet breaking the bone below the knee, and twice by bullets in the body, one of which lodged there and has only within the past eighteen months worked its slow way through the flesh. He said the $30 which he received from the State of Virginia annually as a pension for total disability from wounds received in battle was his sole support, and he was compelled to depend upon relatives who were not able to care for him. As this man told me of his troubles I could readily believe him when he said there was little left of life for him. He had walked to my house from southeast Washington, a distance of 2 miles, and said that he did not have money enough to pay his car fare back.

Mr. Chairman, when I think of cases like this I am ready to say, Let those who draw salaries and live upon large incomes criticion this hill. I speak for these two man. Coan the Saldiers' icise this bill; I speak for these two men. Open the Soldiers' Homes! Let them enter, to remain until, not many years hence, they follow their great commanders, and cross over the river to "rest forever under the shade of the trees."

For such as these it may be:

The world may sound no trumpets; ring no bells;

but I believe

The book of life the shining record tells.

In this matter-

Let others hail the rising sun; I bow to that whose race is run.

Nearly thirty-seven years have been added to the centuries of the past since the close of the great civil strife which came near, very near, rending in twain this great Republic.

It has long since been a favorite theme to declare that this is a reunited country. No one doubts the loyalty of any portion of the country. The man who alleges disloyalty is untruthful and a slanderer. Old Confederates can hold office, national as well as State; can hold commissions in this House and in the Senate of the United States; can sit on the bench of the Supreme Court, and of all of the subordinate courts of the United States; and now when the last restrictions for military commissions in the Army and Navy have been removed; when it is safe and patriotic to give ex-Confederates commissions to command in the Army and Navy, is it not safe and right on behalf of the private soldiers to open the Soldiers' Homes for the disabled and the needy? No harm or damage can be done. Then why not have it done? The country at age can be done. Then why not have to done. The country as large would applaud it.

The sons of Confederate and Union soldiers march side by side to battle, sometimes commanded by an officer who had worn the gray, sometimes by one who had worn the blue. These descendants of Confederate and Union soldiers have equal right of access ants of Confederate and Union soldiers have equal right of access to the National and State Homes.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to repeat the question which was asked a moment ago on my right and not answered; that is, upon what principle the gentleman urges this matter. He understands, of course, that ex-Federal soldiers are admitted to the Soldiers' Homes in the North on the theory that they performed service to their Government, and the Government is, therefore, under obligation to provide for them in their old age and their necessities. But I wish to ask the gentleman upon what theory or principle he proposes to open these Homes to ex-Confederate soldiers? soldiers?

Mr. RIXEY. Well, I might reply by saying upon the same theory and for the same reason that ex-Confederates have been granted commissions in the Army and Navy of the United States.

Mr. SCOTT. Would not the same reason admit to the Federal Soldiers' Home any citizen of the United States who was uanble to earn a living?

Oh, no; it is only upon the condition upon which Mr. RIXEY. the Union soldier is admitted, the only change in the condition being that the soldier who was a Confederate shall have the right to enter as if he were a Union soldier. There are two conditions. The first requirement would be that he must be an honorably discharged soldier or sailor of the Union or of the Confederacy; second, that he must be unable to earn his own living.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I still do not understand

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I still do not understand the point of the answer which my friend from Virginia makes to the inquiry which has twice been propounded. The Federal soldier is admitted to these Homes because he fought to preserve the Union. Now, are you going to admit the Confederate soldier because he fought to destroy the Union? That is what he did.
Mr. RIXEY. I understand that.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Are you going to admit him because he fought to destroy the Union? That is the question

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Are you going to admit him because he fought to destroy the Union? That is the question.

Mr. RIXEY. Let me answer my friend in this way: The gentleman from Tennessee fought to destroy the Union-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did.
Mr. RIXEY. And yet you are here in the Congress of the United States legislating for the people of the United States.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, that does not answer

my question.

Mr. RIXEY. To some extent it does. I say that the restriction against Confederates voting and holding office having been removed, and the restrictions against Confederates holding commissions in the Army and Navy of the United States having been removed, it is right to remove also the restrictions against admitting the Confederate soldier, who is disabled, to the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Pardon me a moment. to my service in the Confederate army (which I should not refer to if the gentleman had not called attention to it), I receive compensation now for my service in this House, because I believe I am rendering a quid pro quo; but I can not come and ask the Government of the United States to pension me or to give me a bounty, or to give me a bounty or to give m Soldiers' Home—because I fought to destroy the Union. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not agree with the argument of the gentleman who takes the position which has been taken in this discussion; and I am proud to say that no Confederate soldier, so far as I know, ever asked to go in a Union Home and never will, I hope. [Applause.]

Mr. RIXEY. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does earn all that is paid to him by the Government; but I have no doubt that there are other gentlemen who could be found in his section who would be equally able to earn the same compensation. It was not necessary to remove his disability to have a Representa-tive from his State. But the gentleman should remember that conditions have changed very materially in the last few years. At the close of that war the gentleman from Tennessee could not have come here as a Representative from his State. He could not have received a commission to command in the Army or the Navy of the United States. Now all of these restrictions have been removed. The gentleman is a member of this Congress, He is participating in the lawmaking power of the Government. And now, when the opportunity comes that certain restrictions can be removed and these disabled Confederates can receive some of the bounty of the Government, the gentleman raises his voice in opposition and says that no Confederate has ever asked such bounty from the Government and his hope is that none ever will.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is precisely what I do hope

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] allow me to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question in connection with what he has just said?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks, as an ex-Confederate soldier, that in any way such soldier would compromise his allegiance to the cause for which he risked his life by accepting the bounty of the Government and going into a Federal Home? I ask him if he thinks that he compromises it any more than when he receives a salary for holding a position under the Federal Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not think that they

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Because in the one case the man is rendering a service to the Government and undertaking to discharge the duties of an office, for which he receives compensation. But you seek now, under this proposition, to compensate him for endeavoring to destroy the Union. That is an entirely different proposition, as the gentleman must see.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But the gentleman does

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). And so far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that those who fought in the rebellion have a right to ask the Government to compensate them in any degree whatever. [Applause.] I do not think that they have the right to come in and ask any favor whatever of the Federal Government.

Mr. RIXEY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not Aff. RIALY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee win not continue to consume my time. He can make his speech in opposition in his own time. What I have said in this connection represents my views. I have stated that since all other restrictions were removed, I do not see why the Confederate veteran is not as much entitled as any other man who helps to pay the taxes of the Government to some consideration from the Government by at least giving him in his old age and disabled condition a home in these Soldiers' Homes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he believes a Confederate soldier who discharged his duty on the battlefield in favor of the South surrenders or compromises any allegiance to the lost cause of the South by accepting a position under the Federal Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is not the question at all

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But I would like the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think the Confederate soldier, having risked all by the wager of battle and having failed in his attempt, ought to be content, and not come to the Government and ask to be taken care of in his old age.

Mr. BARTLETT. And he is perfectly satisfied with his con-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And is satisfied, as the gentleman says, with his condition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, there is no gentleman on the floor of this House who is more willing to uphold the honor and the glory of the Federal soldier than myself. I am willing to grant to him the most liberal pensions. But at the same time, when I recognize the condition of the man who fought against him, of the situation that exists amongst them, then I say against him, of the situation that exists amongst them, then I say as a Confederate soldier, true to every tradition and memory of the battlefields of the South, that I do not see why a man would sacrifice honor by accepting a place in one of the Federal Soldiers' Homes, just as President McKinley said in his speech in Atlanta, that the time would come when the Federal Government would take care of the graves of the Confederate dead.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Carolina.

Mr. POU. Before the gentleman takes his seat I simply desire to correct some figures that he gave in reference to the State of North Carolina. The figures which he gave, and which will appear in the Record, were the appropriation made by the general assembly of 1898. The general assembly of 1900 appropriated $200,000 for the pensioning of Confederate soldiers. The minimum amount received by a pensioner under that appropriation was placed at $30, and the maximum allowed was $120.

Mr. RIXEY. The statement I gave in regard to North Carolina was taken from the State auditor's report for 1900. I presume that if the appropriation is not sufficient to go around, as it rarely is, the pensions are to be prorated.

Mr. POU. That is true; but, as a matter of fact, I am told that the minimum amount received under this bill will be about $24 and the maximum amount $120. Mr. POU. Before the gentleman takes his seat I simply desire and the maximum amount $120.

Mr. RIXEY. I will say to my friend that practically all the States experience the same difficulty, and pensions have to be prorated. The State of Virginia, which has been as liberal as it could in regard to pensions, has been unable to appropriate a sufficient amount for this purpose, and the pensions, I believe almost without exception, have to be prorated, many of the pensioners, as I am informed, receiving less than $10 per year.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is so kind that I hesitate about interrupting him.

Mr. RIXEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I am not doing it in a critical spirit, but I would like to ask the gentleman if it does not resolve itself into this, that this is simply a national charity, or a payment out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of answering what would be a mere charity upon the part of the State; and I would like to ask him whether Confederate service is a matter of national merit for which the nation should undertake to give a reward?

Mr. RIXEV. I will answer the contlargen by stating that the

Mr. RIXEY. I will answer the gentleman by stating that the National Home is to some extent a charitable organization, which takes care of those who are unable to support themselves; and I hold that as we of the South pay our proportion of the taxes, the ex-Confederates are entitled, as a matter of justice and right, to be allowed to go into the Soldiers' Homes, simply for their support and nothing else.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. If they ought to be entitled to go into the Soldiers' Homes and receive care and attention there, why ought they not also to be pensioned by the General Government?

Mr. RIXEY. I think I have replied to that. I have not put it upon the ground of a charity.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not hear the gentleman's statement in that regard

Mr. RIXEY. I hope the gentleman did not understand me as putting it upon the ground that it was a charity.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman will permit me, in his time, to say that the State of Georgia, and I believe all Southern States take care of their Confederate soldiers. Georgia appropriated Mr. BARTLETT. And so far as the Georgia ex-Confederate soldiers are concerned, they do not want to go into Soldiers'

Mr. RIXEY. I am glad the gentleman from Georgia does not want to enter the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. BARTLETT. I said the Confederate soldiers. Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Have you heard any protests from the Confederate soldiers against the provision which has already been made and carried out by the Federal Government for the burial at Arlington of Confederate soldiers and the payment of the cost of the interment and placing headstones at their graves? Have you heard any objection to that from Georgia, Tennessee, or anywhere else in the South?

Mr. RIXEY. I think it is right that that should be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think with thousands of others that it is right.

Mr. LAMB. If my colleague will allow me, I know there are many Confederate camps in his district. I have addressed them myself. Have any of those gentlemen, who must voice the senti-ments of the people, asked him to favor this bill, or do they favor it?

Mr. RIXEY. As I stated in the very beginning, there is no uniformity of opinion upon this subject. I stated that there were extremists who were against it.

Mr. KLUTTZ. If the gentleman will allow me, how long does he think it would be before there would be the liveliest sort of a racket in the old Soldiers' Home if ex-Confederates were admitted, when they got to bragging on both sides about what they had done. [Laughter.]

Mr. RIXEY. I think there would be less racket than my friend anticipates.

Mr. Chairman, I may add, in conclusion, I have felt the less hesitation in urging this measure because the State which I have hesitation in urging this measure because the State which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor has, in common with her sister Southern States, contributed as she was able to the relief of the disabled Confederate.

Virginia, perhaps, more than any other State suffered from the war. She was alone in having one-third of her territory taken from her; and now, with the largest State debt in the Union, she, to her credit be it said, contributes, as I understand it, a larger per cent of her State revenues for public-school purposes than any other State. Besides this, a bill is now pending before her legislature, having passed one branch of it, to increase the appropriation for pensions from $135,000 to $300,000 per annum. It is true there are those who doubt whether under the present rate of taxation the State can meet the increased rate of interest upon the State debt, continue the liberal care of the public schools, meet the growing demands of a great and progressive State, and annually pay out one-third of a million dollars to the disabled veterans. It is safe to say, however, that she will never forget but ever meet and recognize to the extent of her financial ability the solemn oband recognize to the extent of her financial ability the solemn obligation resting upon her to care for her disabled sons.

Mr. Chairman, upon the plains of Abraham one single monument has been erected to commemorate the valor and the death of Wolfe, who led the victorious English, and of Montcalm, who commanded the vanquished French.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the great struggle between the States, when section haters and extreme men were demanding radical measures, Grant was great enough to declare, "Let us have peace;" and the world applauded, and still echoes the noble sentiment. Can not this Congress, at this great distance from the close of that great struggle, rise to his plane and remove the barrier which stands across the path of the private soldier leading to justice, equality, peace, and brotherly love? [Loud applause.]

[Mr. GAINES of Tennessee addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARNEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Lacey, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8581, the pension appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BARNEY. I will.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion and passage of the canal bill, owing to sickness in my family, I was unable to attend. I therefore ask unanimous consent to print

DEATH OF HON. J. WILLIAM STOKES.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to this House the death of my distinguished predecessor, Hon. J. WILLIAM STOKES, late a Representative of South Carolina from the Seventh Congressional district. His death occurred at his home, in Orangeburg, S. C., on the morning of the 6th of July last. Mr. Speaker, in his death this House has lost a valuable and attentive member, his district an able and earnest Representative, and his State a Christian citizen. I offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. J. WILLIAM STOKES, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

The resolutions was unanimously agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from W. R. Bennett, acting chief clerk, executive council of Porto Rico, transmitting a joint resolution, adopted by the legislative assembly of Porto Rico and approved by the governor, concerning the establishment of a naval station in Porto Rico. There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

C. J. R. No. 1. In the executive council of Porto Rico, January 7, 1902.

Mr. Brioso introduced the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved by the executive council of Porto Rico (the house of delegates concurring). That the following petition be forwarded to the President and Congress of the United States:

Whereas the mayal station projected by the Federal Government in the waters of Porto Rico is absolutely essential, useful, and necessary to the best interests of the United States, including Porto Rico; and
Whereas the situation of Porto Rico, lying as it does between the mainland of the United States and South America and on the routes to the isthmian canal, with harbors which afford protection to vessels at all times and in circumstances of war or peace, justifies Congress in giving every consideration to the unequaled claims of this island as proper for a naval station. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the people of Porto Rico will cede possession to any property, buildings, or appurtenances belonging to the government of Porto Rico as they may be required from time to time and necessary for the construction of the naval station in whatever place shall be selected therefor within the island, leaving adjustment of compensation for the title to subsequent legislation or agreement; and be it Further resolved, That all of the municipalities of the island be recommended to make similar offers for the cession of their rights of possession to property, buildings, or appurtenances for the purpose indicated.

CHARLES HARTZEILI, President Executive Council. MANUEL F. ROSSY*, Speaker of the House of Delegates.

Mr. TELLER. I present a memorial of the legislature of Colorado, remonstrating against the leasing of public lands and their cession to the various States. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Certificate.] STATE OF COLORADO, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

United States of America, State of Colorado, ss:

I, David A. Mills, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of the senate joint memorial No. 2, which was filed in this office the 28th day of February, A. D. 1901, at 2.35 o'clock p. m., and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Colorado, at the city of Denver, this 1st day of March, A. D. 1901.

DAVID A. MILLS, Secretary of State. Senate joint memorial.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the general assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represent that the people of Colorado are opposed to the ceding of the arid lands by the United States to the several States or the leasing thereof to any person or corporation. The attention of your memorialists has been especially called to this matter through the many conventions that have been held pertaining to this subject.

Your memorialists believe that the present laws pertaining to the public land are equitable to all, allowing the home seeker and homesteader yet to come amongst us all the rights, privileges, and favors that a free Government can bestow. On the other hand, should the Government surrender to individuals or corporations the public domain, it would do a great injustice to the West.

The late achievements of the arid West, deserving notice and appropriations for irrigation reservoirs and canals, should be promoted and conserved by carefully preventing such governmental works from falling into the control of individuals or corporations.

Your memorialists, in view of these considerations and in harmony with the sentiments they enjoin, beg of your honorable body conservation of, and protection to, the existing rights of the settler and pioneer.

CASIMIRO BARELA,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

B. F. MONTGOMERY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THE TREATY-MAKING POWERS OF THE SENATE,

Mr. TELLER. Immediately after the failure at the last session to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, there was a good deal of discussion in the newspapers as to the power of the Senate in the premises, and there evidently was a good deal of mistake as to what should be our connection with treaties. Since that time the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] has prepared a very careful, and, I think, a very valuable dissertation upon the subject. It was published in Scribner's Magazine, and after reading it I felt that it was one which we ought to have in official form, where it could be referred to. I asked his permission to present it, and I now ask that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HARRIS December 18, 1901, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of Senate Report No. 1, from the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, 2,000 for the use of the Senate and 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

HALL OF RECORDS.

I am directed by the Committee on Public Mr. FAIRBANKS. Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by myself on the 9th instant, proposing the appointment of a joint committee to investigate and consider the question of a site for a hall of records, to report it without amendment; and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, is hereby created to investigate and consider the question of a site for a hall of records, to be erected in the District of Columbia, and report to Congress on or before March 1, 1902, or as soon thereafter as may be possible, their conclusions as to the most feasible location for such a building and the approximate cost thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I am heartily in accord with what I suppose is the purpose of the resolution. If I caught the phraseology aright, it gives the committee authority to report as to the site and cost; but I should like to have the committee embrace in their report what I do not need for myself, but I think many people do—the desirability of such a hall of records. I should people do—the desirability of such a half of records in the like to have the facts of the great mutilation of records in the different departments and all those things gathered and presented by the committee.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That information, if the Senator pleases has been pretty amply set forth in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for a number of years past.

Mr. HOAR. I am aware it has been stated by the departments and, I think, in one case in a speech by Senator Morrill on this floor—I am not quite sure—but if the committee would make with their report such a clear and compact statement as they would be sure to make of the need of a hall of records, it would be a very valuable one. Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is the purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Is it in the power of the committee under the language of the resolution?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Does the Senator wish to have it amended to that effect?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to amend the resolution by adding "and their opinion as to the desirability of such a building," or something of that sort.

thing of that sort.

Mr. HAWLEY. "The necessity."
Mr. HOAR. "As to the necessity."
Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is entirely satisfactory.
Mr. HOAR. Let the words be added "and the judgment of the committee as to the necessity of such a building."
Mr. SPOONER. Let the resolution be again read.
The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachu-

A bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds of land situate in the District of Columbia.

AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR, as follows:

Ordered, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Chair, who shall examine and report into the conduct of the war in the Philippine Islands, the administration of the government there, and the condition and character of the inhabitants. Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words (I shall be very brief indeed; I shall not take more than five minutes) on the resolution at the present time. I do not propose to ask action upon it now. After I get through I shall ask to have it go to the

I have not the smallest desire to interfere with the jurisdiction of the existing Committee on the Philippine Islands. On the contrary, nothing would be more agreeable to me than to have that committee undertake the duty which the resolution contemplates. Nothing would be more agreeable to me than to have the members of that committee as now organized constitute this committee. I do not expect, and I do not think it would be reasonable to desire, that a committee of that kind should be appreciated by the desire, that a committee of that kind should be appointed by the Senate which did not represent in its formation the prevalent opinion on the subject with which it has to deal of the majority of the Senate, let that opinion be right or wrong. It is, of course, proper that in all legislative bodies great public questions should be committed to instrumentalities composed of persons in accord with the prevalent policy, and I do not expect anything else.

But it does seem to me that we ought to have, under the responsibility of Senators, some authority upon which we can depend for the facts, which during the whole of this very important and very painful public controversy we have never had. During the civil war we had a zealous and earnest though small minority.

But during that war, while the majority of the Senate were in accord with the Administration and with the policy of carrying on the war which prevailed, there was a Committee on the Conduct of the War who, at the request of any Senator, investigated and reported, upon their responsibility, the facts which were needed for the Senate and for the country to make up its mind. Now, there are a great many things which have happened in the past. Some of them have gone now into ancient history which it may not be desirable to revive. Some of them are still of fresh and living importance. But there are a great many things at the very hinge and root and turning point of this whole question about which the public are still in doubt. One side repeats with a flippant and arrogant assertion, as if it were a matter of course, a fact one way, and the other side, I dare say with equal arrogance and flippancy, affirms the contrary, and no candid inquirer knows how to find out the truth.

Take one matter which was treated as of a good deal of consequence during the discussion of recent years, the character of Aguinaldo. I saw only last week, quoted from a very respectable paper published in Washington, the statement, as if it were a matter of course, that Aguinaldo had at the time the resistance matter of course, that Aguinaldo had at the time the resistance to the Spanish authority was abandoned sold out his countrymen for a sum of money. That statement has been twice within my hearing repeated on the floor of the Senate. Now, I suppose that if there was ever a shallow, cheap, refuted slander it is that story. President Schurman, who sympathized with the policy of the Administration generally, denied it and paid his tribute to the patriotism and to the personal worth of the Filipino chieftain. The late Senator from Colorado, a manly and outspoken person, expressed his exceeding—I had almost said disgust—at the repetition of that story and his utter disbelief of it.

Now, who knows? If the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines or any other gentleman on that committee will report the facts on that subject to the Senate, everybody knows, what-ever the opinion of any member of that committee may be, that there will be a fair statement; and if it is a doubtful question of evidence, both sides will be stated.

Now comes the question whether we promised the Filipinos independence. I never have seen an argument on the side of those gentlemen who sustained the war as it is still going on in which they do not say that Aguinaldo charges that Dewey promised him independence and Dewey says he lied, and they stop there. That is a pretty important fact, as everybody agrees by the prominence given to it on both sides.

Now, the fact is, as I understand it, that Admiral Dewey, whose naval function was nearly over, and General Anderson, then in command of the military forces, the man to speak for this Government if anybody there could, were together with Aguinaldo. Anderson saw him again later in the day and again the next day. General Anderson says "it is true Admiral Dewey did not say that, but I did," and he says it twice under his own signature. I have seen the statement over the facsimile of the signature of the general then in command of the army.

Is it worth while for us to be dealing with these great questions in this way? They involve the honor of the country. They involve the good faith and integrity of our dealing with this unfortunate people in the matter of their liberty, a matter which we used to think was important to any people in the time when the American people thought liberty and independence were identical and meant the same thing to every people. Is it quite worth while that we should be kept in the dark about that matter?

I would trust this Committee on the Philippine Islands or any single member of it to make a report of the facts in regard to single member of it to make a report of the facts in regard to that transaction, but I have got tired of hearing or reading this parrot talk about it in a matter in which I think the honor of the country I love is deeply concerned.

There is another question. Who began the war, which is still going on? You read a newspaper which sustains the existing policy, or you listen to an able and eloquent speech of some excel-lent Senator, and he will talk about what happened on a certain night when there was an attempt to pass our pickets by some Filipinos and a scuffle, an outbreak, and a shooting, and an appeal to us by Aguinaldo to desist from hostilities; that they did not want war, and our answer that the war was going on and could not now be stopped.

My honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], whom I honor-and I should like to be allowed to use a warmer term of affection and respect than that if it were proper here—stated as his reason in the Senate for not adopting some things that were proposed, that we would be making assurances of pacific intentions to men with arms in their hands against the flag of the United States.

But what is the fact on the other side? The President had given long before that time an order to proceed to reduce the people of the Philippine Islands by military force to a military commander, and General Otis reported that that would certainly bring on war; so he took the liberty of suppressing it, and instead told those people that they should have all the rights of liberty that belonged to the most favored people on the face of the earth. But the fact is that the original proclamation, unamended, was sent to another general, and he published it as the President originally sent it. Is it not an act of war to order a military officer to use military force to subject a people? I sometimes think I have lost all my poor little wit when I hear some of our friends discuss this question on the other side.

I had supposed that was an act of war. If these people were a people entitled to exist on the face of the earth, they would resist. Will any Senator pretend the contrary? I should like to know the fact about that. I should like to have had somebody to tell us that at the time. Those things are of the past, I agree. But I think there is not a man on this floor, unless there be one or two exceptions—I do not know of one—who is able to give a clear and intelligent statement of the truth as to the great difference between Mr. Taft, chairman of the Filipino Civil Commission, and the general in command, General Chaffee. If it were a mere question of money, it involves a great many millions of dollars a year. One of them tells us that those islands are pretty nearly pacified, and that in a little while all will be good order, self-government, and free government. At the same time, if we can trust what is reported as having been said by General Chaffee, we are told substantially that there is not a single man of the whole 10,000,000 who is not plotting against the authority of the United States and anxious to throw it off. That is the substance of what we get from the military officers.

The poor wretches, miserable, despicable creatures, have got an idea into their ignorant heads—more of them read and write than in a great many American communities; they have libraries, schools, universities, an able bar in Manila, and their houses are full of musical instruments, pianos, pictures, and luxuries—but the poor wretched creatures have got an idea that they are entitled to their liberties, and they have got from some barbarous ancient times some old documents which say that it is a self-evident truth that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed and that all men are created equal—poor miserable wretches; and if you bring upon them 70,000 disciplined men, when they are telling that story they will lie about it. They do not lie in this country; they do not lie in England, where they are strong. No English bishop ever signed the thirty-nine articles; no English politician ever made a pledge to his constituents that he did not mean to observe, nor did any American tradesman mislead a customer. There is a story of the people of Vermont, where it is in the constitution, I am told, though I am not sure, that in order to be entitled to vote a man must have made at least $5,000 trading horses with the people of Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. PROCTOR. And we can all vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. They can all vote; but no man in Vermont ever said that his horse was only 7 years old when it was 17. [Laughter.]

Who are these Filipinos whose liberties are being taken away from them by an army of 70,000? Who are these miserable wretches? I want to know something about the character of that people. I want to have Judge Taft, the president of this Commission, when he arrives in this country, come before the committee of this body, where somebody can ask him a few questions. I get some dreadful stories—I do not want to repeat them, and

I get some dreadful stories—I do not want to repeat them, and am not going to repeat them—but I get some dreadful stories from brave soldiers and officers of high rank about the mode in which that war is conducted. I have heard of an investigation now going on in regard to one transaction which, if it be true, has covered with a foul blot the flag which we all love and honor. I think there should be a place where any Senator who makes such a suggestion under his official responsibility can go and say, "I want the witness on that subject brought here and then we shall know." I want that I or somebody on the committee shall have the power to put questions.

Mr. President, there is another matter I meant to allude to in

Mr. President, there is another matter I meant to allude to in passing, which also has gone into ancient history. I do not know how many times I myself have been taunted by newspapers during the last three or four years with a statement attributed to General Lawton, as brave and gallant an officer as ever tied sash about his waist, to the effect that if certain people at home would hold their tongues the Philippine people, who do what the American people do not, according to the authorities, and which is another sign of their progress—read the Congressional Record through every morning and are very much inflamed by the speeches which appear there—that if certain Senators would hold their tongues we would not be in difficulty with the Philippine Islands. That is what they say Lawton said. Here is a statement from

That is what they say Lawton said. Here is a statement from General Lawton verbatim, quoted the other day in the House of Representatives and quoted everywhere, which two military men very near to General Lawton have written to me they heard him make, in substance to this effect:

Among the Filipinos there are many cultured people who would ornament society anywhere in the world—ladies who have studied and traveled, men who have had a good education and a fine brain. Take them as a class, there can as many of them read and write as the inhabitants in many places in America. As for their treachery, you would not have to come so far as this to find that. There is plenty of it in North America. All nations are treacherous, more or less. Some men and nations have treachery trained out of them more than others. What we want is to stop this accursed war. It is time for diplomacy; time for mutual understandings.

This was two or three years ago. This brave officer said:

These men are indomitable. At Baccor Bridge they waited till the Americans brought their cannon to within 35 yards of their trenches. Such men have the right to be heard.

Said the dying Lawton:

All they want is a little justice. I established a civil government at Belinag, with the government entirely in the hands of the natives. It worked to perfection. All these people need for self-government is the protection of our troops till affairs have quieted, and then they will, I have no doubt, advance as rapidly as the Japanese, perhaps more rapidly.

There is not a committee of this body, there is not a Senator in this body, who can tell me whether General Lawton said that or whether it is a forgery or no.

Mr. President, what is the condition there? Three years ago, or nearly three years ago, General Otis shocked this country, shocked the strongest imperialist—if I may use that term—in the country by saying that in his judgment we should have to keep 40,000 troops in the Philippine Islands for some considerable time in order to pacify those people, and the statement was received almost with derision.

How many troops have you got there now? You have 70,000 there now, have you not? How many are you going to have? How long are you going to keep them there? If General Chaffee be right, there is not a man in those islands who is not conspiring against this Government and eager for his liberty.

against this Government and eager for his liberty.

Now, give us a little light. Take the most zealous men in this body and give us a committee that will hear the evidence, put questions, hear both sides, and let us know what is the truth.

questions, hear both sides, and let us know what is the truth.

Mr. President, I expect everywhere to express my want of respect for this policy in as vigorous language as I know how to use. But I have learned in a long life the lesson that men, as good men as I am and better men than I am, look often at great questions of human liberty, of righteousness, and of constitutional law in a manner for which I can not account. I used to think in my youth, and I have not changed my mind, that the Fugitive-Slave Law was the wickedest enactment that was ever passed by a civilized people. At the same time I was bred, as we all were, to think that the most exalted example of human character was George Washington, and among the most exalted examples of human character were the great men who were his companions in his public life. Yet the first Fugitive-Slave Law was passed without a dissent in the Congress in Washington's first Administration, and bears the signature of that holy and stainless character.

So we may learn in our political differences, even on what seem to be the simplest and clearest questions of righteousness and liberty, to respect the purity of purpose of each other. We learned that great lesson, among others, by the recent strife between the sections. While that is true, it is none the less true that there are truths in this world which are God's truths; that there are doctrines which are doctrines of eternal righteousness and justice; and among the truths which are God's truths and the doctrines which are doctrines of eternal righteousness and justice is the truth that no one people has a right to crush liberty out of another, and that every people has a right, under God, to establish its institutions in such form as to itself, and not to any other, shall seem most likely to effect its safety and happiness. That is true of these 10,000,000 people to-day. We are engaged in the unholy office of crushing out a republic, the first great republic ever established in the Eastern Hemisphere. If we had dealt with this people as we dealt with Cuba we should have had to-day a civilized, happy, peaceful republic, sending their youths to our schools, studying our laws, imitating our example, animated by a love, an affection, and a gratitude such as no one people on earth ever yet felt for any other.

Telt for any other.

Why, Mr. President, one of the great events of the history of the world is the discovery and civilization of Japan. Another, in my judgment, is the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. Last summer the people of Japan celebrated, I think it was, the fiftieth anniversary of taking their place among free nations, and the great citizen, a baron, whose name I shall not attempt to give from memory, who represented the Japanese Government on that occasion, declared that everything that Japan is she owes to the people of the United States. Just think of it! This wonderful nation taking its place amongst civilized people in a half century, already encountering China as a superior and Russia as an equal, putting on record her declaration that she owes it all to us! Was there ever such a tribute in all history? Ah, Mr. President, that came from the application to the affairs of modern life of the great doctrine of the immortal Declaration. That is the kind of a world power I want my country to be. The elevation of Japan was the glorious fruit of the seed sown in the great Declaration. I do not believe that the character of my countrymen has so changed in a few short years that we are to wipe out or disgrace either.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I trust the Senator from Nevada will allow me.

The resolution which is proposed relates directly to the committee of which I am chairman, and I trust I shall be allowed to say a few words in regard to it.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Massa-

Mr. Lodge] is recognized.

Mr. Lodge. Mr. President, I do not propose at this time to enter into a discussion of the many disputed questions of the past in relation to the Philippine Islands, for they have been debated at great length, nor do I propose at this time to enter into a discussion of the disputed questions of the present in regard to the Philippine Islands, for they undoubtedly will be debated at great length before this session closes in connection with measures relating to the archipelago. I wish simply to say what I think it is my duty to say in regard to the disposition of the resolution which my colleague [Mr. HOAR] has offered. I hope he will consent that the resolution shall go to the Committee on the Philippines. I did not need his assurance given this morning that he intended by the resolution no reflection upon the committee of which I by the resolution no reflection upon the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. I was sure that he could not intend any such reflection; and yet, Mr. President, the passage of a resolution of that character would, it seems to me, be the most serious reflection to which any committee could be subjected.

The Senate, in view of the importance of the Philippine question, saw fit to create a committee charged solely with matters relating to those islands, and with nothing else. That committee consists of myself as chairman, the Senator from Loyer Mr. All.

consists of myself as chairman, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Alliconsists of myself as chairman, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison], the Senator from Maine [Mr. Hale], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Proctor], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Beveridge], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Burrows], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. McComas], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Dietrich], the Senator from Utah [Mr. Rawlins], the Senator from Texas [Mr. Culberson], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Dubois], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Carmack], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Patterson].

I think, Mr. President, that I am not going too far in saying, excepting myself, that that committee admittedly represents with great strength both sides of this Chamber. I think everyone will agree with me that the Senators placed upon that committee have been chosen with great care, that they are amply fitted to deal with anything that may be committed to their charge, and that they represent all shades of opinion upon this momentous

If, Mr. President, the Senate think that we ought to investigate some of the disputed questions of the past to which my colleague has referred, of the necessity of which, I will frankly say, I am not convinced, I think that committee is fit to do it. In regard to existing questions, such as the difference of opinion between the civil governor and the military commander they are tween the civil governor and the military commander, they are matters immediately connected with the legislation now pending before the committee. We have a bill regulating the tariff relations of the islands and the United States, which I trust will be laid before the Senate by the committee on Monday next. We have a government bill involving a number of most important provisions affecting the business interests of the islands, which will necessarily carry with them a full discussion of the present state of affairs there. The governor-general of the Philippines is expected in this country, I believe, at a very early day. It is needless to say that he will appear before that committee. It is needless to say that the committee will seek for information from every greater. that the committee will seek for information from every quarter in regard to this government bill. If the Senate see fit to charge us with the investigation of any question, past or present, I think, Mr. President, that committee is competent to deal with it, and will deal with it honestly and effectively.

But, Mr. President, if it becomes necessary to appoint another committee to investigate the particular subject committed to the Committee to investigate the particular subject committed to the Committee on the Philippines by the action of the Senate it seems to me that the reason for the existence of this committee has ceased. I think we should be consulted, and I do not mean to go too far, as to the necessity of this investigation. Many of us have given a good deal of attention to the subject. The whole committee intends to give the most careful consideration to it.

I can only repeat that I am certain my colleague did not intend I can only repeat that I am certain my coheague did not intend in the remotest way to reflect upon the committee, and I am sure he is aware that the committee will faithfully discharge any duty relating to the Philippine Islands which the Senate may impose upon it. But I do think that any question referring to these islands ought in justice to the committee to be referred to them, and I hope that that disposition may be made of this resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I stated in the outset as emphatically as I knew how that if the present committee would under ically as I knew how that if the present committee would undertake the task I would myself be abundantly satisfied, or if a subcommittee or a number made up entirely from its present membership would undertake it, I would be satisfied. What I want is only that there shall be somewhere a tribunal authorized to What I want take evidence on these questions, as far as practical, which will do it; and if my colleague's committee will undertake the duty, I shall be entirely content. I think it ought to be done by somebody, and I think that probably would be the opinion of the

What I expected would happen to this resolution when I introduced it was that it would remain on the table a day or two, so that if any other Senator wished to speak to it it would be before the Senate for that purpose, and after that time it would go to my colleague's committee. That is the disposition I had intended to make of it. One or two Senators on the other side of the Chamber have told me that they might have something to say on it, and therefore I think it had better lie on the table for the

Mr. LODGE. Very well; let it lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that when it comes up I shall make a motion to say that I am entirely in accord with the general purpose and say that I am entirely in accord with the general purpose and intent of the resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar]. I had myself prepared a resolution somewhat on that line, and I may say that the Democratic members of the committee had agreed on that resolution. The only difference is that the Committee on the Philippines was named instead of a committee to be appointed, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator perhaps observed that when I began my statement I said I would be entirely satisfied if the Committee on the Philippines would take this jurisdiction.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes, sir; I understood that.

Mr. HOAR. There is no attempt to deprive them of jurisdic-

Mr. CARMACK. So far as I am concerned, I would have no particular objection to the resolution presented by the Senator particular objection to the resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I think, as the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] has said, it would be better that this investigation, if it is to be made, should be made by the Committee on the Philippines. The resolution which I had prepared so read. But after the Senator from Massachusetts presented his I did not present mine. I thought if necessary the proper changes could be made in it.

It is an investigation which I think is absolutely necessary if we are to get at the truth of what is going on and what has gone on in the Philippine Islands. We can not get the truth from the sources there now, and I say that without attempting to impeach the veracity of anybody over there or of any of the authorities, civil or military. But the truth is there has been a constant joint debate going on between the civil and military authorities in the Philippine Islands ever since those authorities have been there.

They have hardly agreed upon any two statements of fact in regard to any single proposition. We have had from the Philippine Commission and from the governor-general there the statement that the islands are pracgovernor-general there the statement that the islands are practically pacified; that nearly all the people there are in favor of American rule, and that there are only a few disturbers of the peace. We have had from General MacArthur and from his successor the statement that there are practically no pro-Americans in the Philippine Islands; that all the people are hostile to the Americans and to American rule. Those are the statements we have had under both Commissions and under both of the military authorities, General MacArthur and General Chaffee. So I say it is impossible to get at the truth of the situation there from any reports that come to us from the Philippine Islands, and if we are to get at the truth there must be an independent investigation made by Congress or by one branch of it.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution go over in its order, without any disposition being made of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the table-

Mr. HOAR. I do not ask unanimous consent that it may lie on the table. I want it to go over in the ordinary way in which a resolution having come up one day goes over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go to the Calendar unless there is unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough to refer to what occurred yesterday? I made this request yesterday:

Mr. Hoar. I should like to have it stand as if presented to-morrow, so that it may have one day then to go over if any Senator demands it.

That is from the RECORD. Now I want to have that request carried out. If any Senator wishes to speak on it to-morrow he will have an opportunity, and then the resolution will go to the Calendar; but I give notice now, as I did when I first addressed the Senate, that it is not my purpose to insist on this resolution to oust the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Philippines, and after it has remained on the Calendar to see if anybody wishes to prock to it. I expect to have no chiestion whether the being the life. speak to it I expect to have no objection whatever to its being referred to the Committee on the Philippines. I should like to have the resolution take that course, if there is no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I have no possible objection to that course. I only want it understood that the motion to refer is pending with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, yesterday, the Chair supposed the resolution would not be taken up to-day, and that, having been taken up to-day, it would take the usual course and go to the Calendar; but on the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, if there is no objection, the resolution will lie on the table until to-morrow after the morning business is closed.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CUBA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. Mason; which was read, as Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the doctrine of reciprocity as stated in the act of 1890, known as the McKinley bill, and the act of 1897, known as the Dingley bill, is the true doctrine and is in the interest of the prosperity of the United States, and that the treaties pending in the Senate should receive consideration and action at the present session of Congress.

Resolved further, That the United States should give to the island of Cuba broad commercial, reciprocal trade, which would be of advantage to the commerce of this country and the discharge of our duty toward the people of that island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois also asked at the same time that a bill which he then introduced should be laid before the Senate. The bill will be read by its title. The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2753) regulating the duties imposed on articles from Cuba imported into the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

Mr. MASON. It is very short.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the products of Cuba hereafter imported into the United States direct from Cuba may be placed in bonded warehouses, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the duty paid thereon at the rate fixed by law at the time the same are taken from said bonded warehouses.

Sec. 2. That this law shall take effect immediately upon its passage

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, as to the bill, I will say briefly that the general complaint of the situation in Cuba is with respect to the inability to market their products or to secure anything by way of an advance upon the growing crops. They are absolutely short of warehouse accommodations, and this bill provides simply that the products of Cuba may be placed in warehouse in the United States there to remain under hond under houses in the United States, there to remain under bond, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, until such time as they are taken out, and that they shall then pay the rate of duty which may be the law at the time they are taken out.

In other words, the people of Cuba can realize something upon their crops which they are now ready to market. They can secure advances by depositing them in a bonded warehouse in the United States, which they can not secure if they are left in the island of Cuba Of course it is contemplated that there shall be some differen-Of course it is contemplated that there shall be some differential or some reciprocal agreement made, but those of us who have had experience here know that it takes a long time to pass a bill through Congress. There will be a good deal of discussion. This is a deliberative body. My only thought was to secure an indication that we intended to obtain that trade from Cuba and to give them free admission to the extent of putting their products in our bonded warehouses; and then if Congress shall see fit to give them a reduction of duty, that duty can be paid when the goods are taken out for use. If no reduction is made, the regular rates of duty will have to be paid.

can ship their products into this country and secure advances, and in that way relieve their immediate distress.

Mr. President, one of the most difficult and interesting func-tions of government is to levy and collect from the people revenues sufficient for governmental purposes. It is agreed by all that the effort should be to collect from the people enough for proper expenditure, so as to avoid the dangers of a deficit, and not too much, so we may avoid still another danger—a surplus.

During the last four years of Democratic administration we saw the real danger of a deficit. Nothing like it has ever occurred in the history of our country, and it became so marked and so enormous as to almost impair the credit of the Government, and capital, which not only talks but thinks, hid its shining light under a bushel and refused to do service for the people. The owner of small amounts of money hid his surplus away in the bureau drawer or in the safety-deposit vault, and the great capitalist preferred to live without interest on his money rather than invest at a time when the Government itself was borrowing money from day to day to transact its legitimate governmental business.

There was no war to demand an extra revenue, but our unhappy financial and industrial condition was brought about by that lack of confidence in the Democratic party to raise and dispose of the revenues of the Government along practical and wellsettled lines. The granaries of the country were filled, but the hands of the people were idle and their stomachs largely empty. New theories were set afloat as to the best way to move the food new theories were set affoat as to the best way to move the food products of the farm to the people who were hungry. The Democratic party said: "We must have more money, different kinds of money, different valued money." In other words, the battle-cry was, "Open the mints," to which McKinley, the great hero and leader of the protection party, said: "Open the mills and the mints will take care of themselves."

The workingmen soon saw that even if you made every mine owner a millionaire it would not bring food and shelter to his family, unless you gave him labor for his hands. The two great ramily, unless you gave him labor for his hands. The two great political battles of 1896 and 1900 were fought out upon that issue; and it is only fair to say now, in passing, that every promise made by President McKinley and his party in the campaign of 1896 has been faithfully kept and performed. That party promised that if it were placed in power it would so adjust the import duties as to raise a revenue sufficient for the needs of the Government, and at the same time to foster and encourage the industries of our

You will admit the fact that immediately upon the Government passing into the hands of the protection party industries that had been idle for years built new fires and gave employment to idle labor. You all admit that the balance of trade during the last five years in our favor has been greater than all the balance of trade in the century of our existence. You all admit, because history shows and statistics prove, that a greater season of prosperity has never blessed our beloved land.

Gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber have talked about it as a mere coincidence; cited the short crops in other nations and the discovery of gold in Alaska, and attributed their great failure to manage the Government to the failure of the Baring Brothers and other remote and contingent causes. whatever they may say upon the stump, the fact remains that it is no coincidence. Gentlemen familiar with our financial history know that for a hundred years financial and industrial disaster came hand in hand with free trade and a doubtful currency. It may be that in some parts of Illinois we had a short corn crop in the year McKinley was elected the second time. That was a coincidence, and the student and philosopher familiar with cause and effect will find it difficult to connect the two. When you take a bird's-eye view of our history for a hundred years, however, you find just behind the dark spot in our financial and industrial history childish and almost puerile legislation in favor of putting our manufactures and labor in competition with the world. Add to that history the common-sense fact that when you buy an article with a hundred dollars' worth of labor from some other country you have stopped the employment of a hundred dollars' worth of American labor, and the other common-sense fact that you have sent a hundred dollars of American money out of circulation in the United States, then you realize that these repeated historical truths are not mere coincidences.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to state that the industrial conditions of the different countries of the world to-day are more fixed by their revenue laws than by any other one thing. To illustrate: The revenue laws of Turkey are a straight ad valorem duty, costing as much to get in things which she needs and can not produce as it does to get the things which she does produce and in which she needs protection; while our Government, under the bill known as the "McKinley bill," protected every industry in the United States by a carefully arranged line of duties, both specific and ad valorem, and in some cases, where necessity required it, by a mixed duty of specific and ad valorem. At the same time it gave a large free list, and admitted free of duty those things essential to the happiness and comfort of the American people which could not be produced in the United States.

In the comparison between Turkey and the United States—I do not for a moment suggest that that is the only difference-but I not for a moment suggest that that is the only difference—but I do make the broad statement that every country under the sun to-day is prospering just in proportion as it treats the masses—just in proportion as it pays and dignifies its labor. It is utter and absolute nonsense, if I may be pardoned the word, to talk about dignifying and paying labor in this country while you permit the cheap and underpaid labor of the other countries of the world to come into free and open competition with our own. But, Mr. President, I did not intend, and do not intend, to dwell upon the subject of the simple doctrine of protection, which our martyred McKinley spoke of in his great speech at Buffalo as the "settled policy" of the nation. It is the "settled policy" for three years more; but let us not forget what Benjamin Harrison said on this subject, namely, that every generation must have a lesson in experience; and I think it well to speak at length and often of the great principles that uphold the doctrine of protection and of the American history which ratifies and approves it, that we reconstruct the could not of a defect in the Transport. that we may put off the evil day of a deficit in the Treasury, free silver, free trade, and free soup among the people of the United

In President McKinley's great speech at Buffalo he has been almost as much misquoted and misunderstood as he was theretofore misquoted and misunderstood in his great speech in favor of the act of 1890, known as the "McKinley bill." His party had the act of 1890, known as the "McKinley bill." His party had promised the levying of a tax, internal and through the custom-house, that would provide for the necessary revenues of the Government, and he had kept his word. He had promised to so adjust the revenues as to encourage American industry, and every intelligent American to-day bears witness that he had kept the faith. When history shall have written all his deeds of valor and greatness, none will show to have brought greater blessings to his country than his keen, careful, industrious work done in arranging the schedules of the McKinley bill, which was repealed by the Democratic party and reenacted in the bill known as the "Dingley bill," along the lines of the McKinley bill, and under the eye and care of William McKinley when he was President of the United States. the United States.

The orator has not yet been born who can picture the changed conditions, and the artist will never be born who can paint the change of scene. What artist could get into one picture the idle father, the unhappy mother, and the hungry children, and in the same picture the busy father, the happy mother, and the well-fed children? What artist could get into one picture the smokeless believes the statement of children? What artist could get into one picture the smokeless chimney, the rusty machinery, and the clusters of idle and discontented men around the shop, waiting for a half hour's work? What artist could put on one canvas the bank situation then and now, or who could paint the changed condition in one picture of nearly seventy millions of people, from the hearthstone of the laborer to the more pretentious homes of our wealthy citizens? I do not detract from any other element in the character of Presilaborer to the more pretentious homes of our wealthy citizens? I do not detract from any other element in the character of President McKinley when I say that every line of the act of 1890 was written and understood by him; it met the approval of his judgment and his conscience; it testified to his practical love and devotion to all the people of the country, and was the most truly American of any legislation ever written upon our books.

But as I before stated, Mr. President, President McKinley seems to have been entirely misunderstood by very many even by some to have been entirely misunderstood by very many, even by some who believe or have heretofore believed in the doctrine of protection. They claim or pretend to claim that when he spoke of the doctrine of reciprocity he had absolutely changed his mind; and because a few Republican papers and a few Republicans have talked so indefinitely and indiscriminately as to the doctrine of reciprocity, our Democratic brethren have taken it up as though reciprocity were something new. Before this session closes you will probably hear gentlemen in this or some other Chamber claiming that President McKinley had departed from his old doctrine and, by reason of some imaginary change in conditions or change in opinion, he was willing to sacrifice some of our industries to reach out for the markets of the world.

Here is the doctrine of reciprocity which was enacted into and became a part of the McKinley bill:

became a part of the McKinley bill:

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January, 1892, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country, as follows, namely:

To state plainly, then, the doctrine of reciprocity so that every

To state plainly, then, the doctrine of reciprocity so that every one may understand it, it is not "free trade in homeopathic doses," as once stated by my honored friend, Vice-President Stevenson, but it is the legitimate child of the doctrine of pro-

First, the Republican party purposes, by its doctrine of protection and the collection of revenue, to protect all the industries in the United States, and to encourage Americans to buy and consume the products of American labor.

Second, those things which we can not produce in sufficient quantities in the United States, such as tea, coffee, sugar, molasses, etc., we purpose to buy of the countries which buy of us, and to discriminate against the countries which discriminate against us.

The above quotation from the McKinley bill is a plain statement of the intention of the Republican party so long as it is in power. The principal things we had to import were the articles mentioned—sugar, tea, coffee, etc.—and we said to the people of the world that the moment they levied a tax upon the products of the American farm or shop that was "unequal reciprocally," then the President was authorized and directed to levy a tariff upon those commodities which came from that country into ours. Our friends upon the other side not only ridiculed the idea, but the great leaders of the Democracy declared it to be a delegation of great leaders of the Democracy declared it to be a delegation of legislative power to the President and unconstitutional; but the Supreme Court decided that it was not a delegation of legislative power by Congress to the President, but that that part of this act which says "it shall be his duty" was a command and direction upon the President to obey the law which had been enacted by a reasonably intelligent Congress to fit contingencies as they arose.

Under that bill containing this doctrine of reciprocity the na-ons of the world treated us with much consideration. Most of tions of the world treated us with much consideration. Most of the nations, being informed of the law, levied no unfair duty against the products of the American farm and shop. Germany did, and Mr. Secretary Blaine suggested that unless some recip-rocal treaty was made which would deal fairly with both parties, President Harrison would proceed to levy a special duty upon German sugars, etc., while the sugars from the other countries of the world would come in free. These mild suggestions from Mr. Blaine eventually brought about what was practically a treaty between Germany and the United States, the substance of which I will set out, and which worked great good to the meat producers of the United States.

Not only was the treaty made with Germany, but with Spanish Cuba. Mr. Blaine suggested that the Spanish duty in Cuba on our flour, breadstuffs, and machinery was reciprocally unequal and unreasonable and diplomatically suggested that it would be the duty of the President of the United States to levy a duty upon Cuban sugar and coffee unless some fair and equitable treaty of reciprocity could be made. It was made, and our trade with the little island increased the first six months more than $1,000,000 a month over and above what it had been any time in the period of

Col. Clark E. Carr, a distinguished citizen of the State of Illinois, was minister to Denmark. Denmark was sending in her sugar free under the McKinley bill from her islands and discriminating against the products of the American farm. Under the direction of Mr. Blaine, he called the attention of the Government of Denmark to the provisions of reciprocity contained in the McKinley bill. The result will be shown by Colonel Carr's letter, as follows:

Hon. William E. Mason,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Sir: In reply to your esteemed favor asking "for particulars of the treaty negotiated by you (me) under the McKinley bill," I have to say that there was no treaty negotiated while I was minister at Copenhagen relating to the matter to which you refer, but that the results were achieved through and as a consequence of the policy of reciprocity inaugurated by the McKinley bill.

I have no copies of my dispatches to Washington nor of my correspondence with the foreign office at Copenhagen, but think I can from memory recall in regard to the matter substantially all that you desire to know.

A long time, I think about two years, before my arrival to assume the duties of the position of minister, through an order promulgated by the minister of the interior under authority of the King's Council, the importation of American pork into the Kingdom of Denmark was absolutely prohibited. My predecessor faithfully and assiduously devoted himself to the work of trying to secure the revocation of this order, but was unsuccessful; and immediately upon my arrival I took it up, and for nearly two years urged that this unjust and unreasonable discrimination against us cease. Going, as I did, from the center of the corn belt, where I have resided nearly all my life, I felt that to be unsuccessful in my efforts in that direction would disappoint my neighbors and friends and all the people living in this region. I presented the case to the best of my ability, and urged the removal of the restrictions in every way possible, without overstepping the bounds of propriety in my relations with an enlightened and liberal government that had always been friendly to us. I showed as best I could the injustice of entirely prohibiting the importation into that Kingdom of so important an article of commerce and of consumption, urging that there was no just reason for such discrimination against us.

The real cause of the inhibition was that to exclude our pork was regarded

I can scarcely express the interest with which I followed in the newspapers the discussion in Congress of the McKinley bill, especially after the reciprocity section was made a part of it. I knew that at that time Denmark was manufacturing beet sugar, which was an important industry. I knew that the market for cane sugar, produced in great quantities by the Danish West India Islands, was almost entirely in the United States. I knew that the great plantations of the island of Santa Cruz were largely owned in Copenhagen. I knew that the reciprocity section of the McKinley bill provided that "Whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses" [and the other articles mentioned], "imposes duties and other exactions upon the agricultural and other products of the United States, which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, etc., he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses," etc. I knew that if the McKinley bill should become a law the President would, if the inhibition of our pork in Denmark continued, regard it as his imperative duty to issue his proclamation suspending the free introduction of sugar from Denmark and the Danish islands into the United States, and that this would be a matter of far greater moment to that Kingdom than any advantage it might gain from the exclusion of American pork.

The officers of the Danish Government, always alert to the interests of their people, had watched the McKinley bill with deep interest in all its stages as it was being considered in Congress, and were very well informed as to its provisions.

When the bill became a law, copies of it were furnished to me from Washington, and it was only necessary for me to leave one of those copies at the foreign office, with the reciprocity clause

The Democratic party ridiculed the doctrine of reciprocity in 1890 and 1892; declared it unconstitutional, and as soon as they came into power they took away from the President the power and direction to discharge his duty of discriminating commercially against the countries that discriminated against us. The moment that doctrine was repealed Spain (in Cuba), Germany, and other countries declared the treaty set aside and renacted their old tariffs and prohibitions against our products and machinery. And the moment the Democratic party took away from the President that direction and power Germany renewed her attack upon American pork, and it has continued from the date of the signing of the Wilson bill until now.

That power was reenacted the moment the Republican party came into power, but has not been so valuable, for the reason that sugar was taken from the free list, and left us without so much

The act of 1897, known as the Dingley law—which was the first opportunity the Republican party had to redeem its promise to provide revenue, protect our industries, and develop the cause of reciprocity—provides in section 3 as follows:

provide revenue, protect our industries, and develop the cause of reciprocity—provides in section 3 as follows:

Sec. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines, and vermuth; paintings and statuary, or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country, or colony, producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products, or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude, 5 per cent ad valorem.

Brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, $1.75 per proof gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, in bottles containing not more than 1 quart a per case of one dozen bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 quart and more than 1 pint, or 24 bottles or jugs containing each not more than 1 pint, §1.25 cents per case, and any excess beyond these quantities found in such bottles or jugs shall be subject to a duty of 4 cents per pint or fractional part thereof, but no separate or additional duty shall be assessed upon the bottles or jugs.

Paintings in oil or water colors, pastels, pen and ink drawings, and statuary, 15 per cent ad valorem.

The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in this section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country, or colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which, in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans into the United States, as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, of the products of such country or colony, for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products of exports, direc

On coffee, 3 cents per pound.
On tea, 10 cents per pound.
On tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, 50 cents per pound; vanilla beans, $2 per pound; vanilla beans, commercially known as cuts, $1 per pound.

I set this out in full that you may observe that there are two distinct plans of reciprocity outlined:

First. By treaty negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate.

Second. An arrangement by the President for negotiating by proclamation, practically the same as provided for in the act of 1890, known as the McKinley bill.

That part of the section of the Dingley law under which the four treaties or arrangements have been made by proclamation provides that it can be arranged with Governments exporting, di-rectly or indirectly, to the United States tea, coffee, etc., and which countries impose duties or other exactions upon American products. Then the President is directed and it is his duty to suspend the Dingley Act, which gives to that particular country the right to import free their tea, coffee, etc. The four arrangements mentioned and carried out by proclamation of President McKinley are as follows:

LIST OF RECIPROCITY AGREEMENTS AND TREATIES UNDER DINGLEY LAW. I. Agreements under section 3, tariff act of 1897, negotiated, proclaimed, and actually in operation.

It is admitted on all sides that these treaties have been of great benefit to the United States, and that they, like the ten treaties or agreements negotiated under the McKinley bill, could never have been negotiated under the Mills bill, the Wilson bill, or any other legislation offered, introduced, or passed by the Democratic

The act of 1897, know as the Dingley law, provides for another separate and distinct plan of reciprocal agreements under which treaties have been negotiated and submitted to the Senate for ratification.

These treaties of reciprocity which have been negotiated by the agency of our distinguished diplomat, Mr. Kasson, died last Congress without even consideration. They were never explained or discussed by the Senate or in executive session so we might know the extent and purport of those treaties. The treaties mentioned are as follows:

Note.—In case of the last two negotiations are pending for renewal, the period for ratification having expired.

It is said by some that some of the treaties will help large manufacturers and injure small ones. Of course that can not be possible if the great and the small manufacturer are in the same busi-What helps sell one farm machine for a large factory will help sell it for a small factory. A gentleman from my State, for whose judgment I have great respect and in whom I have great confidence, writes me that one of the treaties will be of benefit to one industry in which he is interested and of great injury to another industry. If his judgment is correct, the treaty ought not other industry. to be so passed.

The great manufacturers of Chicago with whom I have had communication ask no favors for their factories that shall be of serious detriment to any other American industry. great employers of labor, while building labor-saving machinery. They are Americans, living here and paying taxes here, and they have a right to ask, and they do ask, that these treaties which have been tendered by the executive branch of the Government shall be brought forth for fair and open discussion and be either adopted or rejected by the Senate of the United States, that they may then know in what direction they must proceed to open the markets of other countries for their wares.

Take France to-day. We are buying from her and will always be her customer for luxuries; and it seems exceedingly strange that there is not statesmanship enough somewhere, by acting upon the treaty sent in by President McKinley, signed at Washington July 24, 1899, to provide that when the wealthy American citizen spends his millions of dollars for a feathery millinery fad or citizen spends his millions of dollars for a feathery millinery rad or fancy French wine the French peasant may buy back from us his farm machinery, which is wholly the product of American labor. But, Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the treaties mentioned. My excuse for taking the floor to-day upon the general subjects of tariff and reciprocity (if I need any excuse) is to respectfully enter my protest against the attempt of the Democratic party, aided by some people in our own party, to make it appear that there is no longer need for a restactive teriff in the United that there is no longer need for a protective tariff in the United States, and also to make it appear that President McKinley in his speech at Buffalo had abandoned his doctrine of protection. I call attention to one sentence which shows that no proposition of reciprocity, that no proposition of tariff reduction, can be considered properly by the American people unless it can be carried out without danger to our own industries. Yet our friends on the other side of the Chamber are anxious to take up and consider the whole tariff schedule, when all history shows us the truth of the whole tariif schedule, when all history shows us the truth of the statement in President Roosevelt's message, that you can not even take up for consideration the the tariff laws of this country without shaking and unsettling business.

The diversity of business in this nation has so grown that it is almost impossible for the human mind to comprehend it. Some great industries manufacture for the season, based entirely upon their orders months or possibly a year in advance; others manufacture in one season upon the general basis of the demand for their goods the season before. Overproduction is always a danger, and there is always danger of overproduction. Before a man manufactures under the present tariff he wants to feel sure under what tariff he is to be compelled to sell his goods. The Dingley bill in times of peace protected our material interests and fur-nished a revenue. The schedules were not disturbed for war pur-poses, but we raised our revenues from internal taxes, and it seems now that the only wise course is to pursue that plan in the President's message—to go back to a peace basis—and reduce the surplus by repealing the war taxes which are not needed in times of peace. Having done that, the near and immediate future will settle the question whether the Dingley law is adequate for protection and revenue at the same time.

Mr. President, I stated at the outset that a deficiency was dan-Mr. President, I stated at the outset that a deficiency was dangerous, because a borrowing government in times of peace shakes the faith of the people in the government, or rather in the party in control of the government, and in that way embarrasses our financial and industrial conditions. It is true that a deficiency and a continuing deficiency is bad. It is also true that a large surplus is equally dangerous and bad for the people. It not only accumulates large sums of idle money in the Treasury of the United States, thereby taking it out of the business centers for purposes of circulation; it not only invites and suggests extravapurposes of circulation; it not only invites and suggests extravagant legislation and appropriation; it not only shakes the confidence of the people in the party in possession of the government, but it is the taking from the people of that which the government has no right to take from them—more money than is actually necessary for the legitimate purposes of government.

By the internal revenues which we levied for war purposes, we have to-day a surplus in the Treasury of the United States, in round numbers, of $42,000,000. That this surplus is there and has accumulated during the recess of Congress can not be called a political blunder, but if it is permitted to remain there and increase it is worse than a blunder, and amounts almost to a crime against the people of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury makes a conservative recom-mendation on the subject of internal revenue. I believe it is mendation on the subject of internal revenue. I believe it is clearly the duty of the present Congress to take off every dollar of the war tax and to place us back to the act of 1897, known as the Dingley bill, with the exception of a few items that are taxed not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of regulation. For instance: There is no occasion to repeal the tax on bucket shops. These places of business do not handle or transact any locations to find the purpose of the subject of the purpose of the subject of t legitimate function in commercial life. The bucket shop that fulfills the definition given in the war-revenue act of 1901 does not have a single bona fide transaction in its exchange. This act does not license them, but simply says that where they are permitted to carry on their business by the State laws they shall contribute to the United States Government by way of internal taxation 2 cents on each $100. This has had no depressing effect upon this so-called industry, but it is believed a very wholesome effect, in making the Government officials familiar with the transactions of these gentlemen, and at the same time deriving some revenue from their business. The act expressly provides that the payment of this tax shall not legalize the bucket-shop business in States where it is prohibited by law, and it ought to remain a part of the statutes and laws of this country.

The same can be said also as to mixed flour. The total revenue derived from this tax of 4 cents on a barrel of flour is very small, but the act was not passed by Congress strictly for revenue purposes. It is one of those taxes which do not even produce revenue enough to pay for the collection, but is imposed to regulate the sale of adulterated foods. The Supreme Court of the United States has upheld similar laws which were passed in the form of revenue laws, holding that the courts had no right to call in question the amount of revenue received, and that this act ought not

Passing over the question of common honesty and good morals, leaving out the fact that it has protected nearly 70,000,000 of the consumers of flour against the adulterations of the flour mixer, and in that way protected the health of the people and encouraged the honest miller by relieving him from competition with the common cheat—I say, throwing aside all questions of that kind and looking solely at the question of our foreign trade, there is no act upon our statute book to-day which has so increased the demand for American food products as that amendment to the warrevenue act, which gave notice to the world that flour, the very staff of life, could not be mixed and adulterated in this country without having a stamp upon the package to give notice to the consumer.

I have heretofore taken occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the increase of 50 per cent in our export trade in flour, and the opinion of the manufacturer and the exporter, and also the opinion of the consumer in nearly every country in Europe, that the increase in our exports was largely caused by this Government's guarantee of the purity of our flour. It may be thought that this suggestion has no place in the discussion of revenue and reciprocity. I respectfully insist that it has; that one of the things we are constantly seeking now is to sell our surplus products in the markets of the world. Our surplus products are largely food products, and there is nothing that will so recommend our products and increase their sale abroad as will the establishment of the fact that the Government of the United States guarantees to the consumers of the world that our food products are good.

Clearly, Mr. President, all of these other war taxes should be Why should a citizen pay a special tax upon his money invested in bank and not on his money invested in any other legitimate enterprise? Why should the broker or the banker pay the Government of the United States, in addition to his State, city, county, and other legal taxes, for the privilege of selling promissory notes? Are not the banks as essential to business and as legitimate as any other? True, it was permissible, and they stood it without complaint when it was necessary for the mainte-stood it without complaint when it was necessary for the mainte-nance of the Government in times of war, but that time has passed. The brewers of the nation have paid a war tax since the civil war, nearly forty years, together with an additional war tax during the Spanish war, which was paid without complaint until times of peace. What excuse can there be for continuing this double war tax? Why should we continue the tax upon sales, transfers of deeds, bonds, or certificates of indebtedness? It is

Why should the boards of trade of this country be taxed when the money is not actually needed for governmental purposes? In transactions upon the Chicago Board of Trade it has been discovered that one cargo of wheat may pay a tax four or five times. You buy it in the warehouse 400 or 500 miles west of Chicago, the transaction being on the board of trade, and you pay a tax. You may sell it, and it may be sold again, and each time it pays a tax. Finally it is sold to the miller and that transaction is taxed. The miller grinds it and goes back on 'change to sell it, and it is taxed again. Having sold his flour and paid his tax, he goes into the board of trade to sell the by-product, the shorts and bran, and another tax.

That is what the Secretary of the Treasury very wisely calls vexatious, and in the aggregate amounts to a serious tax, as well as to vex and embarrass trade. To hear some gentlemen talk who have never seen the Chicago Board of Trade, or an institution similar in its character, you would imagine it was a great bucket shop and that its principal business was to bet on the state of the market. While it is true that speculation creeps in there, as it does in all other trading, merchandising, and commerce, yet, as a matter of fact, the members of the Chicago Board of Trade transfer, as merchants or middlemen, from the producer to the consumer more than $1,000,000 a day of the actual products of the farm.

The vastness of these great transactions that take place in the transfer of actual products ought to relieve any fair mind of the prejudice which has been indulged in here by gentlemen who are utterly unfamiliar with the facts in the case. These Chicago merchants paid this tax without complaint. There is nothing that Chicago has ever failed to do when called upon by the Government of the United States, and to do it promptly and cheerfully. From the beginning to the close of the war with Spain, Chicago and Illinois, at large expense to the merchants of Chicago, had ready armed and equipped more men than the President would receive. They have paid this vexatious and burdensome tax without complaint up to the close of the war. They had a right to expect a year ago that it would be reduced or taken off altogether; and they expect now, they ask now, and I believe they will not ask in vain, to be relieved of an oppressive war tax which is not needed for the revenues of the country.

a right to expect a year ago that it would be reduced or taken off altogether; and they expect now, they ask now, and I believe they will not ask in vain, to be relieved of an oppressive war tax which is not needed for the revenues of the country.

But, Mr. President, I do not care to go over the whole list of war taxes, every dollar of which I say ought to be repealed. It would, in my opinion, create no deficiency if we are economical and careful in our appropriation bills; and, as before stated, a small surplus or a small deficiency can excite no danger nor apprehension. It would be beyond the ability of any human being to so exactly adjust our revenues and expenditures as not to have at the beginning or in the middle of each fiscal year some slight

But, Mr. President, the Democratic idea of reciprocity, as expressed in its legislation when it had power, is something marvelous and past finding out. You will remember that Canadian reciprocity was agitated both in Canada and the United States as late as the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses. One of the great statesmen of his day, Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, of Ohio, assisted by John Sherman and many other leaders of his time, discussed with Canada reciprocal trade between the two countries.

I can remember very well how the public press in Canada and the United States was urging reciprocal trade agreements. They wished to sell to us their products, like lumber, salt, wool, and vegetables, while we had thousands of manufactured articles—

I can remember very well how the public press in Canada and the United States was urging reciprocal trade agreements. They wished to sell to us their products, like lumber, salt, wool, and vegetables, while we had thousands of manufactured articles—soap, perfumery extracts, brushes, blacking, and a host of articles included under the general head of "Yankee notions," manufactured well and cheaply in this country; and in the midst of that effort and discussion of reciprocity along Republican lines, Blaine was beaten, President Cleveland was elected, the House of the Fiftieth Congress was largely Democratic, and they undertook the gigantic task of reforming the tariff for the benefit of this country in the bill which was afterwards known and spoken of as the Mills bill. In that bill a bird's-eye view can be obtained of their idea of reciprocity, and it can be understood why leading men of all parties immediately dropped further discussion of the doctrine of reciprocity when they saw, or thought they saw, that we were going to give them all they asked for, without demanding anything by way of reciprocal trade in return. Of course you will remember that, following the suggestion of their President, they were only to put raw material on the free list.

I have the bill before me. Among the things put upon the free list was lumber, salt, and all kinds of vegetables in their natural state or in salt or brine. Now, these were the exact articles which Canada wished to ship to us free of duty, and are the very things we did not want to ship to Canada, and which we could not and can not ship to Canada with profit. Here I read the inserted doctrine of reciprocity, as passed upon by the Democratic party: "Provided, That if any export duty is laid upon the above-mentioned articles, or either of them, by any country whence imported, all said articles imported from said country shall be subject to duty as now provided by law." In other words, in the free list, which includes lumber, boards, planks—all articles of sawed lumber, etc.—if Canada should put an export duty on these articles, then we would retaliate by levying an import duty, as was theretofore provided by law.

There stood Canada at our door, knocking and pleading for free lumber, and offering as a consideration for that free lumber freer commercial relations along certain lines with us, and the Democratic party suddenly coming into power simply upset all our prospects of commercial reciprocity by tendering to her, in the Mills bill, free lumber, without asking for any consideration in return, and left her perfectly free to send in all her vegetables, fresh and in brine, her fruits, game and poultry, milk and eggs, pease and beans, broom corn—clear down to rags, fiddlestrings, and tallow—and left her with perfect freedom to levy an export duty in her own county or an import duty against us upon the very things we admitted free.

Is it any wonder that the statesmen of Canada await anxiously the incoming of the Democratic party before they will talk along common-sense lines with the United States on the subject of commercial reciprocity?

The act of 1890, known as the "McKinley bill," contained the first general provisions for reciprocal trade ever enacted in the United States Congress. I have spoken generally of a few of the treaties made, but I now call attention to the remarkable fact that President Harrison's Secretary, Blaine, negotiated no less than ten treaties or agreements of reciprocity, and that they were all negotiated under the authority of the McKinley bill during a period of less than fourteen months, between the 1st of April, 1891, and the 26th of May, 1892. These treaties are as follows:

Country.	Date.
Brazil Spain (for Cuba and Porto Rico) Santo Domingo German Empire Republic of Salvador British West India colonies Republic of Nicaragua Guatemala Honduras	Apr. 1,1891 Sept. 1,1891 Do. Feb. 1,1892 Do. Do. Mar. 12,1892 May 30,1892 May 25,1892
Austria-Hungary	May 26, 1892

Additional treaties or agreements were made with France and Costa Rica, but were never ratified by the legislative departments of those Governments. When we contemplate the work in the hands of Harrison and Blaine, provided for by McKinley, and then remember the era of prosperity that came when we had a firm protective tariff with reciprocity, we not only stop to admire the character and genius of the three great men whose names I have mentioned, but we are struck with amazement that a great political party like the Democratic party should, by its tariff act of 1894, strike down and absolutely put an end to all of those friendly and profitable treaties or agreements for reciprocal trade.

friendly and profitable treaties or agreements for reciprocal trade. It may be that some very few persons might have been temporarily or slightly injured by those treaties of reciprocity, but those great men were looking for the greatest good for the greatest number. They destroyed no industry; they gave us prosperity. We marveled at the action of the Democracy in striking them down. The Republican party reenacted it and strengthened the hands of the President. You may call it commercial retaliation, if you like. We do not like the sound of the word "retaliation." It does not have the sweet savor nor the sugar coat of diplomacy; but it is plain English and common sense. It says in plain language of the United States that everyone can understand:

We have put upon our free list the things we can not successfully produce, and all the nations of the world who treat our products fairly can enjoy that free list; but those nations of the world that do not treat us fairly, but discriminate against the products of our shops and farms, shall not have the full benefit and advantage of the free list.

The ten treaties which I have mentioned may be found in Document No. 15, part 3, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, and the general effect and tendency of the treaties may be found in the history of our national prosperity and the balance of trade in our favor.

I have already explained how our trade increased in the little island of Cuba. You know how it increased in Germany, and I set out here the list of articles that Germany permitted to be introduced free of duty, and also the list on which she reduced her tariff, as follows:

Contemplate that list, and remember that that was the concession given by Germany to the producers of the United States, not because we gave any special privilege to her, but because we said to her: "You are having the equal advantage with all the other countries in the world to admit your German sugar, etc., and notwithstanding you have the same advantage the other nations of the world have you are discriminating against the products of American shops and farms. Now, unless you give us fair commercial arrangements we will put a tariff upon your products that come from the other nations of the world free."

Germany and nine other countries, rather than lose a market for their sugar here, offered to us the schedule I have just quoted. It was a great day for the commerce of Germany and all Europe when the Democratic party repealed the McKinley bill. Indeed, it may be said that the Democratic party has helped the commerce of every nation in the world except the United States. When contemplating their work I am often reminded of the saying of our grand old governor, Richard J. Oglesby. "Why," said he once in a speech, "you talk about the Democrats running this country. Why, ladies and gentlemen, it is all we can do."

Mr. President, the subject of reciprocity is a growing and constantly changing topic, and I can not hope to have enlightened any of the older students here on this subject. Mr. President, the subject of reciprocity is a growing and constantly changing topic, and I can not hope to have enlightened any of the older students here on this subject. I first heard it explained and discussed by Mr. Blaine in the Harrison campaign in 1888. In a general way, at that time, his arguments seemed to be limited to the idea that we would distribute our trade in purchasing noncompetitive articles from the countries who treated us best in buying the products of our farms and shops. That, practically, was the entire thought expressed in the Mc-Kinley bill, but conditions change, and the march of time demands alert and careful conduct on our part to meet those changed conditions. In order to do so it is not only necessary for legiti-mate trading purposes to use our free list, but also to have the right, the power, and the opportunity of yielding on our highest protected lists something that would not materially injure our own industries, and yet open up a market for what we have to

When President McKinley stated at Buffalo that we were not to injure our own industries, he did not mean that we should not under any circumstances reduce a tariff, if by so doing we could increase our foreign trade without injury to our own. He was then pleading for an advance step in reciprocity, the incoming of which was foreshadowed in the first part of section 3 of the Dingley bill. He was pleading for the golden mean. The Republican party to-day, if true to itself, as it will be, will act along those lines. The reduction of the tariff in certain cases does not mean the destruction of industries, and the Republican party has always so contended. Each schedule must be fought out along the line of common sense and common Americanism.

Take our situation with France to-day. Scores of items which we purchase from France amount to a revenue and not a protective tariff. What I mean is this: Millions are spent by Americans who think they can afford it in these luxuries. They will indulge in these luxuries regardless of the tariff. A slight reduction in the tariff on these articles would not reduce the price to the consumer of the French millinery. It would, however, give the French manufacturer, who is not in competition directly or indirectly with the American manufacturer, ability to sell with some profit; and it would slightly reduce the revenues of the Government, which, in view of our present situation as to revenue and as to our anxiety to sell abroad, we are willing to do to accomplish the purpose of finding a foreign market for our surplus products.

May I state the proposition in another way? We forced, by legitimate means, the nations of the world to trade fair by refusing to them, under the McKinley bill, the advantages of our free list, enjoyed by all nations, unless the nation under consideration gave us what the President of the United States determined to be equally reciprocal trade. The Dingley bill says in substance that we are not only to use the free list—and that was certainly ratified and approved by President McKinley at Buffalo—but we are also to encourage other nations to give us equally reciprocal trade by yielding to them some part of the tariff on highly protected articles which is not needed for the protection of our own industries.

This reciprocal adjustment must always be in the hands of those who believe in the simple doctrine of protection, so that when any doubt is raised by the reduction of a single item, the doubt must be resolved in favor of the American and against the stranger.

To make a simple illustration: If it is true, as I believe it is, that to make a reduction on those things which the wealthy people of this country buy of France will enable the French to make a simple and fair profit upon their goods and the only damage to the United States is a slight reduction in its revenue, can we not well afford to do that if they will take down their high tariff against American farm machinery and other products of the United States, all of which are produced by American labor? This is the advance step in reciprocity contemplated by the framers of the act of 1897. This is the advance step in reciprocity clearly outlined by our martyred President in his last speech at Buffalo. This is the advance step in reciprocity to which the Republican party must address itself, and it will prove itself equal to the task.

Mr. President, I have heretofore mentioned briefly the treaty of reciprocity made between Spanish Cuba and the United States, and I refer to it again, not so much for the purpose of further discussion of the general principle of reciprocity as I do for calling attention briefly to what seems to be our imperative duty on that subject with Cuba now. Our taking possession of the island of Cuba, the causes that led up to it, and the result of it are all of such recent history that we need not recount it.

We promised the world to withdraw from the island as soon as of such recent history that we need not recount it.

We promised the world to withdraw from the island as soon as it was pacified, and we are keeping the faith. The road has seemed long and tedious to some; but they are having their first great election there, and soon the flag of Cuba—the flag with a single star—will be set in the sky and run with all the other nations of the world in the race for civilization. She is to be our friend and our competitor—our neighbor, nestling under the wing of the Monroe doctrine—and, in her way, our rival in the commercial world. When we think where she was three years ago and what she is now, every drop of American blood tingles with pride and satisfaction.

The Republican platform of 1896 pledged freedom and independence to Cuba. The rafters in the convention hall rang when that pledge was made, and the Christian civilized world to-day applauds the Government of our country because we have kept the pledge. The honest Cuban who fought and sacrificed for his country appreciates that, and upon our request—nay, Mr. President, practically upon our demand—they inserted in their constitution, in the very organic law of the republic, that they would make no political treaties without our consent. This practically make no political treaties without our consent. This practically bars forever effective commercial treaties.

No nation lives and prospers entirely within itself. Certainly the little republic, with its young feet just touching the uncertain sands and shoals of self-government, ought not to be embarrassed by us. Had we not insisted upon this contract, written within her organic law, I might feel differently and vote differently upon the subject of reciprocal trade with Cuba. If she had absolute liberty to trade elsewhere to make commercial alliances across liberty to trade elsewhere, to make commercial alliances across the sea; if she even had power to entangle herself with her old alliance, the country of Spain, I might feel and vote differently upon this question. We have put her in leading strings, so to speak, with all the good we have done for her politically and for civil and relief liberty was the Continuation of the continuation. civil and religious liberty upon the Continent; we also have said to her, "You can not trade elsewhere without our consent; you must trade with us." And the question now is, Will we trade fair?

I have met many distinguished men within the past three years who said: "True, we promised not to take Cuba, but the exigen-cies of war compelled us to take it, and we must keep it." I cles of war compelled us to take it, and we must keep it." I have felt, Mr. President, that when a republic lies it is a stain upon every citizen of the republic. There are many men whose patriotism I do not question to-day who are willing to bind Cuba hand and foot as to commerce with other nations of the world, and, by refusing reciprocal trade with our own country, to administer to the little Republic commercial starvation until she knocks at our door for admission. I can not and will not so

I confess, Mr. President, that in view of our demands upon Cuba, with which she has readily complied; that in view of the high purposes for which we went to war against Spain and drove her forever away; in view of the brave American lads who went out to fight for humanity's cause, and in view of the graves of our heroic dead, I can not approach the discussion of reciprocity with Cuba with that degree of cold commercialism with which I would treat the great against Spain and drove treat the great nations of the world.

It may be for the present that the farmers making beet sugar would be injured by such a reciprocal treaty as we may make with Cuba, but the same farmers will be benefited, as I believe, by the breadstuffs, meat, and provisions for which we will find a market in Cuba. Time alone will demonstrate and answer the question, in Cuba. Time alone will demonstrate and answer the question, but nothing can excuse us from honorable and fair trade with the people of Cuba; and if we refuse it, then common honesty and plain duty will demand that we pass a resolution relieving her of her constitutional embarrassment and permit her to trade where best she can with the other nations of the world.

Oh, Mr. President, what crowning glory it will be for us—this treatment of fair trade with Cuba! The reconcentrado has disappeared forever. Children are no longer shot as spies, the little daughters are no longer sold into houses of shame, and Las Foses has disappeared—the cruel pen written about by the little nun, who said: "In the night there is no light, and in the morning newborn children are mingled with the dead." That picture remains only as a nightmare of the past. We paid a mighty price in blood and treasure for the change, and the American conscience will demand that our relations with Cuba must close upon the same lofty plane upon which they began. Even commercial honor demands that we must say to her when we leave the island: "Put your brave little republican flag in the sky—the flag your fathers gemands that we must say to her when we leave the island: "Put your brave little republican flag in the sky—the flag your fathers fought for for half a century. We will give you fair commercial opportunity. Work out your own national life and your own salvation with fear and trembling, for while the Monroe doctrine is written in the hearts of the American people no other nation, great or small, shall be permitted to strike your colors or invade your soil" your soil."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What does the Senator desire to have done with the resolution?

Mr. MASON. I understand my colleague [Mr. Cullom] has suggested that it lie over. I am willing that it should be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the resolution lie on the table for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the resolution lying on the table? The Chair hears none. In the absence of objection, the bill (S. 2753) regulating the duties imposed on articles from Cuba imported into the United States, which was introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Mason], will be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 15, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CLERKS AND CLERK HIRE.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present two privileged reports from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri submits the following report from the Committee on Accounts.

House resolution No. 90.

House resolution No. 90.

Resolved, That members of the House of Representatives who are chairmen of committees entitled to annual clerks, excepting the Committee on Elections No. 1, shall be entitled to the same allowance for clerk hire during the sessions of Congress as is authorized by law to other members of the House who are not chairmen of committees; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to make payment hereunder, out of the contingent fund of the House, in the manner provided in the joint resolution approved March 3, 1893, until provision is made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, or otherwise by law, to carry out the purposes of this resolution. Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall apply to and include the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

(2) That the chairmen of the following named committees are hereby authorized to appoint clerks to such committees, to serve during the sessions of the Fitty-seventh Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per diem each, to wit: Elections No. 3, Pacific Railroads, Census, Industrial Arts and Expositions, and Examination and Disposition of Documents.

(3) That the elerk of a committee of the House during the sessions, provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, not disposed of by the resolution adopted by the House December 13, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the Committee on Elections No. 2.

(4) That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is hereby altorized to appoint a clerk to said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $2,000 per annum during the present Congress.

contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $2,000 per annum during the present Congress.

(5) That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is hereby authorized to appoint a stenographer to said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House during the Fifty-seventh Congress, at the rate of $100 per month.

(6) That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to employ a messenger who shall serve in the file room of the House, under direction of the file clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $75 per month, until otherwise provided for.

(7) That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to appoint J. J. Constantine as assistant telegraph operator, to serve the minority side of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $100 per month, until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the report read. The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolutions numbered 1, 6, 14, 21, 34, 49, 52, 53, 54, 55, 63, 65, 63, 70, 73, 76, 77, and 78, authorizing the appointment of clerks and assistant clerks to certain committees, and for certain other additions to the clerical force of the House, have had the same under careful consideration, and beg leave to report a resolution in lieu thereof and to recommend its adoption.

Considering paragraph 1 of the resolution herewith reported, your committee would state that resolutions were considered by it providing for assistant clerks to the following-named committees, at a compensation of $6 per day during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress, to wit: Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Insular Affairs, Invalid Pensions; also a stenographer at $6 per day, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Judicial, and Public Buildings and Grounds.

Of the foregoing the committees on Military Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Naval Affairs, and Judiciary had assistant clerk during the Fifty-sixth Congress at $100 per month. The committees on Insular Affairs and Public Buildings and Grounds were not provided with assistant clerks during the last Congress.

Resolutions were also considered by your committee providing for the at $100 per month. The committees on Insular Ahairs and Fuolic Buildings and Grounds were not provided with assistant clerks during the last Congress.

Resolutions were also considered by your committee providing for the appointment of assistant clerks to the following-named committees, at $100 per month during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress, to wit: District of Columbia, Rivers and Harbors, and Public Buildings and Grounds. The committees on the District of Columbia and Rivers and Harbors, and the Committee on Claims, which now asks for an assistant clerk without naming a salary, were provided with assistant clerks during the Fifty-sixth Congress, at salaries of $100 per month each.

This demand for increased clerical assistance arises from two causes. First, that the volume of business transacted by the committees mentioned imposes upon one clerk more work than he can perform; and, secondly, that the chairmen of the committees are deprived of the services of a personal clerk, which the law gives to other members who are not chairmen of committees. It is assumed that where assistant clerks are granted to committees they are not only called upon to assist the regular clerk, but also to serve in the capacity of private clerk to the chairman.

In considering this proposition, the question arose as to the compensation to be paid assistant clerks. The customary allowance has been $3 per day, the extreme limit allowed by law. Some of the resolutions considered by your committee named that amount, several asked for $100 per month, and others fixed no compensation whatever. While desiring to afford these committees the relief asked for, by granting additional clerical assistance, your committee found difficulty in agreeing as to the salary to be paid assistant clerks.

At the usual compensation of $6 per day it would cost, it is estimated, to provide for assistant clerks to committees having annual clerks, the sum of $2718 for the Pitty-seventh Congress. There are $2 such committees which the resolution would cover. To grant personal clerks to the chairmen of those committees at $100 per month would involve an expenditure, it is estimated, for the remainder of this Congress of $18,913. This demand for assistant clerks comes almost entirely from the "great" committees, so called, which have annual clerks, and whose chairmen are denied personal clerks during the sessions of Congress.

Your committee, therefore, are of the opinion that it would be more conomical, more just and equitable, and better for the service of the committee has other members have. Chairmen of committees are allowed personal clerks during the vacation of Congress by law, and there is greater reason, it seems to your committee, why they should have them while Congress is in session. We believe it is generally conceded that the clerks of the large and important committees have enough to do if they properly attend to what is, strictly speaking, committee work, without being called upon to set as private secretary to the chairmen. The few exceptions which may be made only prove the rule, and because a few committees have annual clerks reason for denying all chairmen of such committees have samual clerks reason for denying all chairmen of such committees have samual clerks for the services of elerks and stenographers because the elerk of the committee was engaged with the business of the committees which do the bulk of the business of the House, and the statement has recently been repeated, that certain chairmen of the large committee was engaged with the business of the committees at a great for the services of elerks and stenographers because the elerk of the committee was engaged with the business of the committees is but an indirect and in the end a more expensive method of allowing private clerks to the Ch

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to ask how many additional subordinate clerks this resolution carries?
Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, does this require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not. This is a privileged report.
Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman how many additional subordinates this resolution carries over the allowance of the last Congress?

Mr. JOY. A few more in number, but it requires considerable less outlay of money. About one-half of the committees provided the chairmen with personal clerks, who were provided for in the last Congress as additional clerks at the rate of $6 a day. While the number is greater, the expense is less.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then the expenditure for these clerks will be less than in the last Congress!

The expenditure will be considerably less.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be postponed until the next session of the House, and in the meantime the resolution and report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JOY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have one more report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 58.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to Margaret Kennedy, widowed mother of James V. Kennedy, late an employee of the House, a sum equal to six months' salary, and funeral expenses not to exceed $250.

Mr. JOY. I want to say that this is the usual resolution where an employee dies. It carries six months' salary and a reasonable amount for funeral expenses.

The question was considered, and the resolution was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LACEY in the chair, for the further consideration of the pension appropriation

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I was much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia on the pending bill, and particularly in his clear and somewhat exhaustive setting forth of the generous treatment of the ex-Confederate soldiers by the people of the South. If the deserts of these men, seamed by the storms of time and scarred by the bullets of battle, are to be measured by the devotion to the cause which they believed to be right, too much can not be done for them by those whom they sought to serve.

There seemed to be a difference of opinion among the friends of the ex-Confederate soldiers on that side of the Chamber as to whether or not they should be admitted to Soldiers' Homes supwhether or not they should be admitted to Soldiers' Homes supported, in the language of the distinguished leader of the minority, "by the Government they sought to destroy." These differences you gentlemen must settle among yourselves. While, as an ex-Federal soldier, I can not withhold my admiration of the spirit which declares "we will care for our own," at the same time I predict the day will come when the doors of the National Homes will be open and welcome extended to the aged and dependent survivors from both sides in that great conflict.

The gentleman from Virginia may be criticised now for his advocacy of the proposition, but the time will come when he will be commended for his sagacity. I speak only for myself when I declare that if it is a choice between the two, beautiful as the sentiment is, it were better to feed the hungry and shelter the living Confederates than to care for the graves of their heroic and immortal dead. [Applause].

I sympathize with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gaines] in his feelings of resentment that there should have been any question on the part of the people of the North as to the loyalty of the South to the Union, and that the Spanish-American war and the Philippine war were necessary to demonstrate that loyalty. It is true that in their expressions of gratification some of our people in the North may have spoken, and even now speak, of the ready response of the South to the call to arms as a surprise. They may have mistaken the manifestation of the spirit of loyalty for loyalty itself.

But certain it is that among the most important secondary results of the short and decisive conflict with Spain were the bringing about of a better understanding, of greater mutual regard and good feeling between the North and the South than had existed during the preceding forty-five years; the demonstration that whatever differences might have existed in other years between the sections, they do not exist now, and the service of notice on the civilized world that in estimating the result of an appeal to arms against the United States they must reckon on the united strength of the people who followed Farragut and Semmes on the sea and Grant and Lee on the land.

I listened with both interest and gratification to the carefully prepared remarks by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Talbert]. In the main I agree with him. It is true, as he asserts, that we pay vastly more than any other country to the But certain it is that among the most important secondary TALBERT]. In the main I agree with him. It is true, as he asserts, that we pay vastly more than any other country to the pensioners of the Government. It is true also, which he might have said but did not, that our Regular Army costs more, man for man and officer for officer, than that of any other nation; it is true that we have the smallest standing army of any great power; it is true that in any war of magnitude we must rely more on the citizen soldiery than upon the Regulars.

No government in modern times has fought so protracted and desperate a war, nor called into service such vast numbers of men, as did ours in defense of the Union. No armies ever fought for such a stake as did those which were marshaled under the

for such a stake as did those which were marshaled under the Stars and Stripes in the great civil conflict. Aside from the moral question involved, resulting in the liberation of the white man of the South from his bondage to slavery and liberating the black man from slavery, the march of events in every year from 1865 to 1902 has but added culminating testimony to the beneficent results of that mighty struggle of arms.

A study of the casualties in the great wars of modern times reveals the fact that none is comparable to those in the war between the States. The South would be unworthy of her heroic defenders did she not seek by self-imposed taxation to care for the maimed and shattered survivors of the legions which again and again staked everything on the gage of battle and lost. Certainly the Comparation of the legions where the legions which again and again staked everything on the gage of battle and lost. the Government can not be less grateful to those whom she summoned to defend her life or die in the attempt. While I would be classed among those who believe the nation has gone to the limit of liberality in the matter of pensions to its soldiers, yet I resent the assertion that it ever has or will or can pay the men who fought its bettles and saved its life. All it can do its to who fought its battles and saved its life. All it can do is to express in a tangible manner, through the pension system, its express in a tangible manner, through the pension system, its appreciation of their valor and sacrifice and devotion.

That the distribution of pensions is not equitable no well-informed person will deny. Many men are on the roll for more than they deserve, judged by any service rendered or hazard taken; many are receiving less than is their right under the intent if not the letter of the law. But these inequalities are inseparable from the system. It is as impossible to separate the deserving from the undeserving among the pensioners as it is to separate among the survivors the real soldier from his imitation. Every man who served in the ranks and at the front knows the battles man who served in the ranks and at the front knows the battles were fought and the hardships endured, as a rule, by mere skeletons of regiments. There were skulkers and cowards in every battle and in both armies, and yet the men who never fired a gun at the foe on either side, and who shirked duty and hardships whenever and wherever possible, to-day share in the com-ships whenever and wherever possible, to-day share in the common glory of American valor and sacrifice in war.

I agree perfectly with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Talbert] that the pension roll should be "a roll of honor," and so does every true soldier among the survivors of the Union Army, whether pensioners or not. If the gentleman knows or can devise any system by which the "deserters," "bounty jumpers," "camp followers," or "coffee coolers" (to use some of his favorite phrases) on the pension roll can be detected he can rely on the assistance. on the pension roll can be detected, he can rely on the assistance of the great body of the Union soldiers to make that system effective to the removing of the last one of the unworthy from that column of heroic, battle-scarred men who quarterly answer to the roll call of a nation, glad to remind its defenders of its unfailing gratitude. That there are unworthy men among the survivors of the Union Army who are willing to take advantage of the Government's bounty is but another evidence of the truth of the general principle that under like circumstances men are at all times alike. The same difficulties were experienced with the men who fought under Washington in the Revolution, under Scott in Mexico, and under Lee in the rebellion. Indeed, by its own statements the South is confronted by this same difficulty in more than one State whose generosity seeks to care for the disabled and needy Confederates.

I was surprised at the statements of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gaines] relative to the surviving Mexican war soldiers, which was, in effect, that they were not liberally treated. Does not the gentleman know that they are on precisely the same footing as the Union soldiers in so far as wounds or disabilities incurred in the service and in the line of duty is concerned? Does he not know that every honorably discharged soldier of the Mexican war, though he were perfect in health, rich in purse, or enjoying the emoluments of lucrative office, was put on the roll as a pensioner when 62 years of age? Does not the gentleman know that the survivors of no war in our history have been so generously dealt with as those in the war with Mexico? At this time almost one-half of the survivors of the Mexican war receive from $12 to $72 per month, and all the remainder receive $8 per

"The Spanish-American war soldiers who have been pensioned receive," says the Commissioner of Pensions, "an annual average says the Commissioner of Pensions, "an annual average largely in excess of the average annual value of the pensioners of the civil war." Almost exactly two-thirds of the Spanish war soldiers now on the pension roll receive from $8 to $72 per month. No such showing as this can be made relative to the pensioners in any previous war in our history. When we remember that for every 6 of the survivors of the civil war who applied for pensions within a given time 20 of the survivors of the Spanish-American war have applied, it makes us wonder whither we are drifting.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the gentleman think that that condition to which he refers has been brought about by the fact that the rule of the office calling for evidence in all these old cases has been made so severe and so hard to comply with that the old soldier can not secure a pension under the old law, at this late date, which requires him to produce testimony of an event happening some thirty-five or more years ago, and the young soldiers of the late war, knowing that their fathers have been beset by this difficulty, have hurried forward their claims while they are in a position to produce the necessary testimony?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I do not think so.

Mr. CURTIS. I do.
Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There may be some truth in it, but I do not think the gentleman assigns the correct reason. No doubt many of these young men are deserving of a pension. That is one thing

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.
Mr. SHATTUC. Notwithstanding your liberal views of the treatment of Confederate soldiers in the Union Homes, and all that, do you think that we should ever lose sight of the fact that on one side there was eternal right and on the other side eternal wrong?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I hope, Mr. Chairman, from what I have already said that nobody on the floor of this House or elsewhere can draw but one inference as to my views regarding which side was right and which side was wrong.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. We did not understand the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Shattuc]. Will the gentleman repeat it?

Mr. MANN. I think it might be well to turn aside to another thought. One might be led to suppose from the gentleman's remark that he was intending to criticise the Spanish-war veterans for applying for pensions so numerously. Do I understand that the gentleman does mean to criticise those soldiers?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; in no sense a criticism. I answered the gentleman partly before I was interrupted. I said a feeling seems to obtain to some extent, and it is by no means confined to applicants for pensions, that whatever one gets from the Government is clear gain.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the gentleman applies that to the men who ask for pensions because they were soldiers in the Spanish war?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; I will answer that pretty

Mr. CURTIS. May I make another suggestion in connection with the question I asked a minute ago?
Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the law and the rules of the Department the Pension Office now requires a soldier who served in the war of 1861–1865 to prove his disabilities or the origin or contraction of his disease in the service by two of his comrades. It is over thirty-five years ago since those disabilities occurred or the disease was contracted. You know, as a soldier, that it is, in the majority of cases, impossible to meet the call for this proof. Do you not think that the knowledge of this fact is one of the things which actuates the young soldiers in their desire to have their records on file now while their comrades are alive?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If I may be allowed to be specific, I had two sons in the Spanish-American war. One of them came home showing clearly the marks of the service upon him. Those boys had not been mustered out ten days before they were receiving blanks from the pension agents to make out an application for a pension. I want to say to you that I believe that was a very general condition of things throughout the list of those who had experience as soldiers in the Spanish-American war. I want to say, further, that in the particular cases to which I have referred the letters, to my certain knowledge, went into the wastebasket. The boys are thoroughly healthy to-day and I hope they may never be called upon to ask the Government for pensions.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.
Mr. SNODGRASS. When you were on the subject of Mexican pensions I was too far away to make myself heard. I tried to attract your attention then. There was a service pension of $8 a month granted to Mexican soldiers, and in 1893 there was an amendment to that act which gave to all those who would make affidavit of their dependent condition and their inability to earn a living an increase in the amount to $12 a month. I understand the gentleman to say that they have been treated as fairly as any other soldiers. Is there not a service pension of $12 a month granted to the Federal soldiers?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I repeat the assertion I made, that in the history of the Government no soldiers in any war have been treated as liberally as the Mexican-war veterans.

Mr. MANN. There is no service pension to Federal soldiers.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There are two classes of soldiers drawing pensions who served in the Union Army. First, those who draw pensions under the general law whose disabilities are of service origin. They form one class. There is a second class who draw pensions, who are disabled of body, and who are necessitous though their disabilities may not be traceable to their war. tous, though their disabilities may not be traceable to their war service. The limit of pension to the latter class of men is $12 a month. Now, there are thousands and scores of thousands of men who served to the end of the war—men who are now 62, 65, and 70 years old—who are not receiving any pension: whereas every single Mexican soldier, as I have before said, who was in that service, at 62 years of age, whether disabled or not, whether poor or wealthy, whether having the emoluments of office, was placed on the roll at at least $8 a month.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Is there not a service pension for the Federal soldier of $12 a month?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Not a service pension; no, sir. Not only that, but multitudes of men are not eligible under any law upon the statute books to receive any pension; and they are men who fought to the end of the war.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Is not the act of 1890 a service pension?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; not as I understand a service pension. As I understand a service pension, it would embrace all honorably discharged soldiers who served in the war, and is for services rendered regardless of physical or financial condition; such, for example, as all Mexican-war soldiers received when arriving at 62 years of age.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Now, will the gentleman not vote to increase the pension of Mexican soldiers to $12 a month.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Why should I?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Because many of them are old and very few of them are left, and $8 a month is insufficient for their support.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, $12 a month is insufficient for the support of the others.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I stated a while ago, and I will not retract-I was about to say when I was interrupted that I believe the Government has gone to the extreme in the matter of liberality in paying pensions.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention for a moment to the treatment of Mexican soldiers?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes.
Mr. WHEELER. You have stated that the Mexican soldiers were treated with more liberality than the soldiers of any other war of the Republic.
Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not true that the Federal soldier who was enlisted as a teamster or a musician and was wounded in the service is pensionable?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If he had been mustered into the service of the United States and detailed for duty as teamster, yes; but if he was simply a civilian and employed as a team-

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman know that men who enlisted in the Mexican war as teamsters and musicians, and who have been wounded in the discharge of their duty, have no pensionable status?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Does not the gentleman know that the vast majority at this time on the pension roll as Mexican veterans never went out of the camp in which they were mustered, or out of the State, and never saw war service?

Mr. WHEELER. And quite a respectable number on the pension roll of the Federal Army never went out of their States or heard the music of the minie ball. The gentleman a moment heard the music of the minie ball. The gentleman a moment ago said that the Mexican soldiers had been treated with greater liberality than any other soldier of the Republic.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. And I still maintain it.

Mr. WHEELER. Not many years ago in my district there was a Mexican veteran who had enlisted as teamster, who was detailed to active duty and wounded in battle, yet he has no pensionable status

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Was he mustered into the service of the United States?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; he was mustered into the service of the United States. And just to cover such a case as that I introduced in the Fifty-fifth Congress a bill giving a pensionable status to parties who had so served, but it was not reported by the Committee on Pensions. I do not see the consistency of the gentle-man's argument when he says that the Mexican veterans have been treated with the same liberality or a greater liberality than the other soldiers

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Just a moment. You put a specific case where one man is not pensioned against a whole class who were pensioned.

Mr. WHEELER. No. The gentleman can not put me in a false position. Your statement was this, that the Mexican veterans have been treated more liberally than the other soldiers of the Republic. This particular case that I have referred to is one of many. I have in my district a number of Mexican veterans who from time to time have written me to obtain pensions for them.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. If the gentleman wants to take my time he can have it.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the gentleman was permitting me to interrupt him.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to ask me to yield to him for a question.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that every man who did actual service for the Republic ought to have an equal pensionable status.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will give an instance which bears out his contention.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. My father served in the Mexican war and also served in the civil war. For many years, I do not know how long, he has drawn a pension as a veteran of the Mexican war, but has not been eligible as a pensioner of the civil war, which is clearly a case which proves absolutely your position.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me,

I wish to say that I have a near neighbor who was a Mexican soldier, who has lost one eye, and the other is nearly out. The man dier, who has lost one eye, and the other is nearly out. The man is hardly able to get about, and yet he is receiving a pension of $12. Do you think that your veterans of the civil war receive that amount with that state of disability? He is now only paid $12, and for many years he only received $8 a year. He is about 80 years of age, a fine old man. Do you think that is treating him as fairly as soldiers of the late civil war are treated?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I will answer by giving another specific illustration. If you go to individual instances you will illustrate the difficulty in the administration of the Pension Bureau. There are many instances, a good many of them, that disclose cases where the pension is not equitable, but that does not destroy the beneficial object of the Government nor the fact that it is the honest purpose of the Bureau to be liberal to soldiers

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have before me here the figures of the Commissioner of Pensions, in his report, page 162, which show that a lieutenant-colonel and all officers of higher rank are show that a lieutenant-colonel and all officers of higher rank are paid $30 a month; a major, surgeon, and paymaster, $25 a month; a captain, provost-marshal, and chaplain, $20 a month; a first lieutenant, surgeon, deputy provost-marshal, and quartermaster, $17 a month; second lieutenant and paroling officer, $15; and all enlisted men, $8. Do colonels work any harder than the men in the ditches? And yet when a man becomes physically disabled and feeble from age, if he is an enlisted man they give him only $8 a month and the colonel $30.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I am not talking on that line, but I will give you a specific instance. I know of one man who never saw during the war a Confederate soldier unless he was a prisoner, who never shot a musket in battle, who is receiving $30 a month, and another who was mustered as captain of a coma month, and another who was mustered as captain of a com-pany—I was looking around for his member so that he might con-firm what I am about to say—and who successively became a major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, who was severely wounded at Stone River as a major in command of the regiment, who was again severely wounded at the battle of Chickamauga as lieutenantcolonel, who has in his lungs to-day (and was not able to speak above a whisper for many years after the war) a bullet received when he was colonel commanding his regiment in the desperate assault on the heights of Kenesaw Mountain; a man who bore all the responsibility of a regimental commander for over two years in actual war, and that man a brevetted brigadier-general for heroic services on the field of battle, and who is a constant sufferer from his wounds, receives precisely the same amount as the private soldier who never saw an armed Confederate. Does the gentleman think that is right?

It is one of the inequalities of the system that we can not get away from. They are there, and we must make the best of it. The only remedy for these individual cases is to be found through special legislation by the Congress, against which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Talbert] inveighs so earnestly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, one question more.
Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not want to detain the House further, unless the gentleman has a question—Mr. GIBSON. Before the gentleman from Michigan closes on the subject of the Mexican war veterans I want to read the law

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just one thing more. On page Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just one thing more. On page 163 of Mr. Evans's report he says, under the act of February 12, 1889, where a man has "lost both hands" he gets $100. Now, here is the gentleman that I have in mind—a farmer—who has lost one eye and is nearly blind in the other, wholly unable to work, and he only gets $12 a month by the grace of the last Congress. Is that fair?

Mr. GIBSON. Inasmuch as there has been some discussion as to the pension to soldiers who served in the Mexican war, I desire to read the law on the subject. It is as follows:

Sec. 107. Invalid Pensions for War with Mexico.—Any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, whether of the Regular Army or Volunteers, disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted while in the line of duty in actual service in the war with Mexico, or in going to or returning from the same, who received an honorable discharge, shall be entitled to a pension proportionate to his disability, not exceeding for total disability half the pay of his rank at the date at which he received the wound or contracted the disease which resulted in such disability. But no pension shall exceed half the pay of a lieutenant-colonel.

Showing that the Mexican war soldiers are exactly on the same basis as the civil war soldiers.

Mr. WHEELER. Does that section include the word "team-

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; nor does it with reference to soldiers of the civil war

Mr. WHEELER. But teamsters secure pensions.
Mr. GIBSON. No, sir.
Mr. SHATTUC. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I would like to know who has the floor?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of latitude allowed in this discussion. I was very Mr. Chairman, there has been glad to hear the paragraph read by the gentleman from Tennes see, and it seems to me that it ought to satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky as to the letter of the law and the spirit of the Government in dealing with the surviving veterans of the Mexican

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not care to be further inter-

Mr. WHEELER. I want to say a word to the gentleman, that my understanding—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand that the gentleman from Michigan has declined to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I yield for a question.

Mr. WHEELER. A teamster detailed for actual duty and wounded in the line of duty is pensioned as a veteran of the civil

Mr. CAPRON. If he is enlisted, he is.
Mr. WHEELER. A teamster detailed for actual service and wounded in the actual service is pensionable.

Mr. GIBSON. There is no such law. Mr. WHEELER. There may not be such a law, but they are pensioned.

Mr. GIBSON. There is not in a solitary case in the five years I have been on the committee. I have a bill specially pensioning them, but it has not been reported by the committee.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman from Michigan shall have the floor.

Mr. GIBSON. I think the gentleman from Michigan is able to look out for himself.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, as I was about to say when I was diverted from the line of my remarks in relation to the Spanish-American soldier, I certainly would be the last man, with two sons on the rolls, to cast any aspersions upon that splendid body of young men who went forth from the North and the South, from the East and the West, and who struck down Spanish sovereignty in the western world. I am not here, gentlemen, to cast a reproach upon my own flesh and blood, but I believe that I ought to state the truth as I see it. Twenty of these young men to every six who served in the Union Army are to-day applicants for pensions from the United States.

The civil-war veterans fought more and harder battles and endured greater privations than any army ever marshaled on this continent, save only the army that they faced on the field of conflict. When it comes to that I bow to the Confederate soldier, who, conwhen it comes to that I bow to the Confederate solder, who considering the almost worthless money in which he was paid, the meager clothing and camp equipment with which he was supplied, and the scant rations upon which he was fed, gave the sublimest exhibition of devotion to a cause which he believed to be right that this continent ever saw. [Applause.] And yet, let me say that these men, my comrades of the Union Army, who fought the battles and endured the hardships that they did are outclassed as pension claimants by more than three to one from those the great body of whom never left the American soil nor endured any hardships beyond those incident to the routine duties of the camp in a friendly country. At Gettysburg twice as many men, in round numbers, went down on the two sides as Shafter took under the flag of our country into Cuba. [Applause.] Almost twice as many men in the desperate encounter on the field of Chickamauga, and so it was again and again in that gigantic struggle in which Americans on either side contended for the mastery. My sons Americans on either side contended for the mastery. My sons laughingly speak of themselves as "tin soldiers."

They ridicule the idea of being pensioners upon the Government for what they did. It was no fault of theirs and their comrades that they did not fight. They sought to discharge every duty imposed. Had circumstances required it, the splendid valor disclayed at Fill Control and on Son Line. Hill would have been required to the control of the con displayed at El Caney and on San Juan Hill would have been revealed by every regiment enlisted in the Spanish-American war. I simply state a fact. I am not passing any reflection upon the men who were injured by wounds or who are suffering from disabilities contracted in the service and in the line of duty. This Government is great enough and rich enough to care for all the men who suffered in its defense or at its command. But what I am saying is that it is well for us to pause when we are appropriating $140,000,000 and to ask whither are we tending in this matter of pensions.

In view of the fact, so well stated yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], that there is a constant stream of applicants for pensions coming from across the seas, and that notwithstanding the great and increasing mortality among the survivors of the civil war our pension disbursements keep at the maximum and are likely to indefinitely, ought there not to be the closest scrutiny of all legislation upon this subject?

We have to look the question in the face and meet it not wholly

We have to look the question in the face and meet it not wholly from the standpoint of sentiment, much less from that of mere personal, or political, or partisan advantage, but as men who have sworn to do our duty as legislators for the whole people.

I am a pensioner. I am willing to stand by what I say. There is not a wakeful hour of my life by day or by night when I do not suffer from wounds received in battle. I know what it means to carry the knapsack and the rifle, the haversack and the canteen, for three long years as a private soldier. I speak from the standpoint of experience when I say we have gone to the extreme of liberality.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here as the advocate of the policy of the present Commissioner of Pensions, nor am I here to defend all or many of his rulings, but I am here to declare it as my belief that so long as he keeps within the law and seeks to administer his great and difficult trust without fear or favor according to law he should have the honest and hearty support of men of all parties in this House and of all good citizens throughout the country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, every appropriation bill should carry the smallest amount commensurate with the best public service. Every dollar appropriated should represent 100 cents in the way of efficient public service. The appropriation bill represents not only the wealth of the country, but the widow's mite as well. I am not prepared to say this appropriation bill carries too large an amount, but am rather of the opinion, judging from the light of experience, that the amount is not as large as it should be. Two years ago a similar bill carried $144,000,000. This bill carries in round numbers $138,500,000-a reduction of five and a half million. I am not prepared to say that there is a deficiency by reason of the bill of the last Congress. I do say, however, that in my district the medical examining boards have not been paid for three quarters; that the Government to-day owes them nine months' compensation. This should not be.

It is stated truthfully that in addition to those who have been on the pension roll heretofore there are 5,000 Spanish war claims. I can hardly conceive, in view of the fact that there are nine hundred and ninety-odd thousand claims growing out of the war of the rebellion and 5,000 additional claims by reason of the Spanish war, rebellion and 5,000 additional claims by reason or the Spanish war, 500 of which have already been allowed, that we can, with the liberality which the people of this country expect, reduce the amount by five and a half million dollars. But whether that may be so or not I will not here try to determine. I am for the bill as it is presented, notwithstanding the fact that I do not approve, nor do my brethren around me on this side of the House, of the policy of the Administration with reference to our foreign possessions. Whenever the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy calls for men to fight the battles we find the best blood of all sections answering, and whenever the Commander orders, the brave "boys" follow, and whatever may be their hardships, every section of this country responds. Wherever they go, whatever the command, the "boys" who follow "Old Glory" are the heroes of all Americans. [Applause.]

This bill in some sense represents the gratitude of a generous nation to its heroes of war. There were 2,859,132 men who responded to the call of President Lincoln. There were 61,362 killed in battle; 34,729 who died of wounds, and 183,287 who died of disease—a total of 279,387. Twenty-nine thousand seven hundred in battle; 34,729 who died of wounds, and 183,287 who died of disease—a total of 279,387. Twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-five died while prisoners of war, many of whom fill graves marked "unknown." Three hundred thousand men who followed and fought for the Stars and Stripes lie buried in the national cemeteries. There are in Arlington 16,264 buried, 4,349 of whom fill "unknown" graves; at Fredericksburg, 15,257, 12,270 "unknown;" at Vicksburg, 16,600, 12,704 "unknown." It has been estimated that the war of the rebellion cost $6,189,929,909. Why all this sacrifice of life? Why all this expenditure of treasure? It was not simply a contest of endurance between the North and the South. It was a principle that was being settled—

North and the South. It was a principle that was being settled settled not only for the sixties, but settled for the great Republic in all time to come. What was that principle? It was that the Constitution, written by the fathers when they threw off the British yoke, should be maintained. It was that the spirit of the Declaration of Independence should be preserved to the generations of the Republic to come. It was that the Union might be saved. And what was the fruit of the war? It was the establishment and reinconnection of constitutional liberts. lishment and reincarnation of constitutional liberty. It was the maintenance of the spirit of the Declaration of Independence. It was and is to-day a united country under one flag, under one constitution, and under the spirit of the fathers.

By reason of the fruits of that war the great American Republic was enabled to extend its hand to suffering Cuba when she cried out for aid. We presented the magnificent spectacle of a country founded on liberty, governed by the spirit of the golden rule, spending its treasure without stint, sending forth its Army and Navy without hope of reward or the desire of acquisition; and in less than one hundred and twenty days the Spanish domination was stricken down and Cuba was free. [Applause.] And yet we are in the possession of the Philippine Islands, although nearly three years have elapsed. How long shall we so remain? We have, on this side of the House, since the close of that war asked our friends on the other side to say how long and for what purpose we are to retain these islands; but they have never answered. We have asked them whether they meant subjugation, and, finally, a colonial system, or did it mean freedom and liberty; but they decline to answer, except to say that the islands must first be sub-

General Chaffee suggested the other day—and it is generally conceded—that it would probably require 30,000 men for twenty-five years to overcome and subdue the Filipinos. Let us see what that means in money. Thirty thousand men under arms in the Philippine Islands means an average of $1,500 a year for every soldier. Thirty thousand men, therefore, means $45,000,000 a year for twenty-five years, or a grand total of $1,125,000,000, and that is not nearly all the cost.

For some reason we are in the Philippine Islands, and let us see what we are there for and what the expenditure of money and life is to be. I have just shown you that $1,125,000,000 will be required for the maintenance of the Army during the period of subjugation. Add to that $20,000,000 paid to Spain for the purchase of the islands, making $1,145,000,000, to say nothing of the other expenses incurred.

We have already in sight the expenditure of more money than the national war debt. Not only $1,145,000,000 in money is to be expended, but it means vastly more than that. Aye, Mr. Chairexpended, but it means vasily more than that. Aye, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, we have not only expended that large sum of money or have become obligated for it. Let me call your attention to a comparison that may be drawn to show what that expenditure really is.

Three years of expenditure in the Philippines means more money to the United States than was expended on the Revolutionary war.

to the United States than was expended on the Revolutionary war, the estimated cost of which was $135,193,703. The estimated cost of the war with Great Britain in 1812 was $107,159,103. The estimated cost of the war with Mexico was $100,000,000. We have already expended by reason of our possession of the Philippine Islands more money than the cost of the Revolutionary war and of the war with Great Britain in 1812, and almost as much as the cost of these two great wars and the war with Mexico added. For what? In order that we have order in the islands, they say. We join the Administration in the proposition that we have a duty to perform, and one of the duties is to have order restored in the islands, that they may establish a stable government of their own. Was all this expenditure of money and loss of life necessary to restore order and meet our obligations? We think not. An open avowal of the American principle of freedom and self-government would probably have avoided it. to the United States than was expended on the Revolutionary war,

I addressed a communication to the War Department, and received the following response:

WAR DEPARTMENT ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, January 11, 1902.

Hon. Robert W. Miers, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sign Replying to your letter of the 10th instant to the Secretary of War, asking for a statement of the number of deaths in the Regular and Volunteer Army of the United States during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, in Cuba and Porto Rico by reason of wounds or disease, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

I regret that it is entirely impracticable to furnish you the number of soldiers discharged by reason of wounds or disease incurred in the service, because of the fact that no statement giving this data has ever been prepared in this office.

Very respectfully,

GEO. ANDREWS

GEO. ANDREWS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

We are not only expending fifty or seventy-five million dollars a year for the maintenance of fifty or sixty thousand troops in the island, but there have been brought to untimely graves 355 gallant American officers and 10,258 American soldiers. What does that mean in America? Three hundred and fifty-five plus 10,258, making 10,613 Americans who have been sent to untimely graves. For what?

I concede, gentlemen, that wherever duty calls, the American I concede, gentlemen, that wherever duty calls, the American Republic does not stop to count the loss either in life or in treasure; but ought we not to know for what purpose we are sacrificing men and millions of dollars? It is certainly not for any great American principle; not even for territory that can be carved into States. Yet they call it expansion, for the good of the inhabitants of the islands. Some favored Americans, who are holding office at the hands of the Administration, whose salaries are paid by the Filipinos, are reaping their share of the reward. The country has the right to know how much money is being expended, and how many lives are being sacrificed, and for what purpose, in order that it may be ascertained whether it is necessary purpose, in order that it may be ascertained whether it is necessary and whether it is justifiable. If it is to maintain the Republic of the fathers, if it is to give to the Cubans or to any other nation the freedom that we so much love, and which during a hundred years we have learned to cherish, then the great American people can appreciate the purpose, and if that be the only means will not complain, but will wholly justify. If, upon the other hand, it is to strike down the Constitution and override the Declaration of Independence; if, instead of maintaining freedom and granting liberty to the peoples and nations of the world, it means bondage and a colonial system attached to the Republic, then, for one, I am prepared to say that I do not yield my assent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I allow no man to be truer to the principles on which this Republic was founded than I am. I believe eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. This is the Government of the people, and they believe in the Constitution and the kind of berty and freedom taught by the fathers. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the other day the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], whom we have learned to regard as the constitutional lawyer upon the other side of the House, the gentleman who advises the floor leader, in debate upon the Philippine tariff question said that the statement in the Declaration of Independence that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed is not true and never was true. Think of it, Mr. Chairman, the great American Republic was not only founded in opposition to British tyranny, but founded on the Constitution and on the Declaration whose praises we have been pleased to sing these hundred years. Now it is said by so distinguished a member of this House as the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Declaration written by the fathers either was a lie or else they did not use good English. It is the best of English; it is susceptible of no other interpretation than that the just power of government is derived from the consent of the just power of government is derived from the consent of the governed.

And how does the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania maintain the position taken? He cites the case of slavery, and says that there are some people on this side of the House who advocated slavery, and that slavery was in existence for a long time after the Declaration was written. I would remind the gentleman after the Declaration was written. I would remind the gentleman that during an honorable and able career of fifty years, on the floor of this House and elsewhere, it has ever been his boast that he did not believe in slavery personally, nor did he believe the Constitution permitted it, nor that it was within the spirit of the Declaration of Independence. Does he turn his back on a record of fifty years, on the record of his ancestry, and the record of the Republic of the fathers, in order that the Government may be brought within the spirit of the Declaration of Independence? No! But that he may justify the Administration, which by its policy is making the Declaration of Independence appear a lie. He says that the Declaration of Independence, which grants us He says that the Declaration of Independence, which grants us liberty, which was written by the fathers of the Republic, is not

I take it that when this statement comes from such a high source I am not presuming too much when I say that is the position of the Republican party upon the question of what we shall do with the Filipinos. They say to us that we have not indicated any policy. I say in return, gentlemen of the other side of the House, it is you who have declared no policy. It is this side of the House who, for the last three years, by resolution and speech on the floor of the House and in convention assembled, have implored you to state your position with reference to the future of the new possessions. Do you say the Constitution governs them or that it does not govern them? What right has the Administration to permanently govern any people except that given by the Constitution? Do you mean that the spirit of the Declaration of Independence shall control or not? Will you assert the right of the Administration to go into any country and permanently take possession and govern those people without their manently take possession and govern those people without their consent? We have asked you these things many times, and you will not make bold to answer, yet you continue to do just that thing thing.

Do you mean to establish a colonial policy for the government of these islands outside of the Constitution? You are moving in of these islands outside of the Constitution? You are moving in that direction every day. If you do, we ask you to say so and let the American people, who are paying these millions of dollars in taxes, decide whether they approve it. It is but fair to the people, who are sovereign, to know what your policy is to be. Aye, more, let the mothers and fathers who furnish the great army of recruits to carry the old flag to glory know for what purpose they are fighting these battles. None of the 10,000 Americans that have gone to intimely graves may be your love or mine but each have gone to untimely graves may be your boy or mine, but each was the son of some American citizen, and he has the right to know whether his son's life blood was shed for liberty or whether it is a sacrifice to the spirit of commercialism of the day. We have said to you we will have no part in your policy when you say that you will strike down the Constitution, when you say that you will establish a colonial system. Upon the other hand, we have already stated our policy and stand by it, because it is the American policy which all Americans love. We ask you to tell us plainly for what purpose you mean to reduce these islands to order. If when that is accomplished you mean to assist them to establish a government of their own, if you mean to grant to them the liberty that all Americans so much love, then we will be in the front rank to join you and say to the people of the islands: We are responsible for order; we are your friends, and you must restore order and establish a stable government. have gone to untimely graves may be your boy or mine, but each establish a stable government.

But when you say you will change the form of government not only by the increase of the Army but by striking down and turning your back upon every principle dear to the American heart, we can not come to your rescue and suggest a policy along that line. We can only plead with you to establish an American policy. Since the beginning of the Republic we have been taught policy. Since the beginning of the Republic we have been taught that a large standing army is a menace to any free people. That is a maxim that I need not argue. Taking that as accepted, I want to call your attention to the Congressional Record of December 18, 1901, from page 338 to the top of page 359, inclusive. There are 20 pages, double column, of Executive nominations and Senatorial confirmations of Army appointments. In one day there were over 1,800 Army confirmations

Think of it! In the great American Republic, where we love peace and believe in liberty; where we mean to call on the young men of the country whenever the national honor requires a re America a chance not only in the civil affairs of life, but in those of war, the Senate of the United States in one day confirmed over 1,800 permanent army officers. This goes on, and the policy becomes a fixed one. The people submit, pay the taxes, and furnish the soldiers under a pretense of necessity. Would it not have been better to have avoided all this if possible. When a large list of army officers are confirmed you may be assured there will list of army officers are confirmed you may be assured there will be some pretext for maintaining the Army and enlisting privates from the common people. If we may subjugate the Filipinos and establish a colonial policy, is it not possible that some pretext may be found to subjugate other countries? Three years ago no one could have anticipated the present. Had we better not consider where we are trending?

Look at yesterday's Congressional Record and you will find there were 70 more Army officers confirmed. What does it mean? It means, by reason of the glamour and the tinsel of war surroundings, that we are being changed from the old paths trodden by the fathers and scarcely know it. We are first amazed, then we endure, and finally embrace. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, the great American Republic that loves the liberty that was guaranteed by the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence has before it not only a great future, but it is at a point where it behooves every American citizen, whether he be Democrat or Republican, whether a member on the floor of this House or otherwise to constitution. Look at yesterday's Congressional Record and you will find whether a member on the floor of this House or otherwise, to consider well where we are trending.

The people control at the ballot and must be induced to study and understand the real situation. If we are to establish a great standing army from thirty to fifty thousand men, if we are prepared to say that we will not maintain the Constitution, then we may bid farewell to the interests of the plain people who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. It is the Constitution that defines the rights of every citizen, be he ever so humble, and guarantees to him every privilege that is granted to the strongest. You strike our written Constitution out and you strike down that for which the forefathers rebelled and established the Republic. You strike it down and you have stricken down all that which makes the great American Republic the ideal Government of the world. I am not an alarmist. I believe there is leaven and patriotism enough in this country to maintain the national honor in times of war or in peace. The spirit of commercialism is abroad and seems to be ready to suggest any policy that appears successful for the present.

Prior to 1861 we had the other state of affairs. We had States' rights run to seed. So much so that many of the best men of the country could read the old Bible and see the right to own the colored man because he was black. It was self-interest and years of false teaching that warped the judgment. Now, upon the other hand, like the pendulum of the clock, when it is withdrawn far in one direction you may expect it to swing far to the other. The pendulum has now swung to the other side, and you have the spirit of commercialism, you have the spirit of concentration, what some are pleased to call a strong government which would take from the States and the common people on every hand rights that are guaranteed to them and concentrate all power in the hands of the few, again illustrating that one extreme follows another.

I believe, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, in the common people. When the people of this country fully understand that we are maintaining an army of 45,000 or 50,000 they will want to know what we are paying for their maintenance. When they realize we have already sent to untimely graves over 10,000 brave American boys they will want to know what it is for. Reason will finally be restored. The people will come to their second sense, and whenever they do that they will say, "What is the policy of the Administration with reference to the government of the Philippine Islands, as well as to the people at home?" They will say, upon the other hand, "What is the policy of the old Democratic party, which has always stood by the Constitution and the common people?"

They will see, further, whenever they undertake from a dispassionate view to find what the two positions are, that the Administration is controlled by the will of the trusts and combines, and see why our late lamented President said, "It is our plain duty to have free intercourse and trade relations with the Porto Ricans," and in a short time, at the dictate of the great sugar trust and the When they realize we have already sent to untimely graves over and in a short time, at the dictate of the great sugar trust and the monopoly power of this country, said, "We must take them in outside of the Constitution and levy a tax."

But, Mr. Chairman-

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As the gentleman is speaking about the Constitution, I want to state to him the fact that they are deprived of the right of trial by jury in the Philippine Islands, also, and yet they have Filipinos strong enough and learned enough in the law to be Supreme Court judges.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I am obliged to my friend the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, but I can not for a moment hope to cover all the enormities of the Republican position, and will leave some to him for a future occasion. [Applause.] The public will see, when it comes to understand in the light of reason the Democratic position, that the Democratic acknowledge out public will see, when it comes to understand in the light of reason the Democratic position, that the Democrats acknowledge our duty and responsibility in the islands, and are willing to meet the responsibility as Americans. We are not less willing than the Republicans to perform our duty. Instead of subjecting them for the purpose of bringing them under control to make them our subjects and finally establish a colonial policy, we would say to them we must have order, and when you have established order, when you have established a government that relieves us of our when you have established a government that relieves us of our when you have established a government that relieves us of our responsibility, we will withdraw the Army and the Navy and say to the nations of the world, "Here is a little republic that caught the spirit of freedom from our own beloved Republic."

They have drunk deep at the fountain of liberty. They have tried to establish a republic of their own. It will probably not be a republic for the present such as ours, but it will be the best they can do. It will be their own, and it will be our purpose and privilege to help it and to hold up their hands and stand by them and see their republic grow. I believe if the Administration had said at the beginning of this war, "There must be order; establish a government of your own that is stable and thereby release us of our responsibility, then we will withdraw and leave you to grow," that the war would have ended in six months. Not only do I believe that would have been done, but I believe now, after three years of expenditure of treasure and the loss of more than 10,000 lives, if the great American Republic would say to the peo-10,000 lives, if the great American Republic would say to the people of the islands, "You must be orderly, you must establish a government of your own, a stable government, and when you do that, we will withdraw and protect you," that the war would now be ended inside of six months.

Mr. MADDOX. Has the gentleman estimated the cost of the war? I did not hear his figures, if he gave any.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; I estimate the cost of maintaining the army in the Philippine Islands at about $1,500 a man per year. If an army of 30,000 is maintained, that means an expenditure of $45,000,000 a year, or 50,000 would mean $75,000,000 annually.

Mr. MADDOX. What has it cost us already, if you have made any estimate of the money we have already spent there?

I have been unable to get accurate fig-

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I have been unable to get accurate figures, but according to the best information obtainable and computing along the lines already indicated, it has cost us probably $380,000,000.

Without further trespassing upon the time of the House, I desire again to refute the idea that our friends upon the other side of the House are so pleased to go to the country with. They say we have not proposed any plan. They say, "What is your policy?" When they say it, it is always in connection with their policy that strikes down the Constitution and the right of these people to eventually and ultimately have a government of their own. We do not join in your policy. We can not adopt a policy that spends millions and millions of dollars in islands that we can not make into Territories or States, in islands where the people will not make American citizens, in islands where the people if they were brought to this country would, like the Chinese, come to compete with American labor, we have no part or parcel and do not join you. I favor the exclusion of the Filipinos as well as the Chinese.

If, upon the other hand, you will be governed by all the known principles upon which the American Republic was established, and will extend to the people the spirit of the Golden Rule, then we will join you. Our policy will be to let them establish a government of their own and help them maintain it, and see it grow, not only the pride of the Republic, but the pride of the whole world.

Our Republican friends say that we must subjugate these islands in order that we may establish trade relations. We would say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, we, too, would establish trade relations; we would join you in making the Philippine Islands a gateway of trade to the world, but we would make it through a free and not a subjugated people. We would make it through people who have learned to be our friends because they have learned liberty from studying the grand principles of freedom exemplified by the great American Republic. That would be our gateway. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have proclaimed a policy. Aye, more. We have proclaimed a policy that is the policy of the American people, and the day is not far distant when the Administration will be brought to a just account for a largely increased standing army, a largely

We have proclaimed a policy. Aye, more. We have proclaimed a policy that is the policy of the American people, and the day is not far distant when the Administration will be brought to a just account for a largely increased standing army, a largely increased expenditure of the public treasure, and a largely increased number of mounds builded all over this country where the boys in blue have been laid away. [Applause.]

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to thrust myself upon the House in regard to this bill, but circumstances have absolutely forced me to it. This bill reminds me very much of a story of a many who was hanged on the bonders of Marico.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to thrust myself upon the House in regard to this bill, but circumstances have absolutely forced me to it. This bill reminds me very much of a story of a man who was hanged on the borders of Mexico. No one knew who hung him, and there was found on his back a placard which said, "This man had some bad qualities, and others a darned sight worse." [Laughter.] This bill, however, has some good qualities. It does some good in the way of a circulating medium. It is about equivalent to the Government loaning money with no interest at all, except it is not paid back. [Laughter.] This money paid under this bill comes easy and goes easy, and is like a periodical issue of new circulation. One objection I have to it is that there is one section of the country—the one to which I belong—that does not receive any benefits of this distribution of currency.

which I belong—that does not receive any benefits of this distribution of currency.

It reminds me of the story of a little boy who was listening to his mother when she was explaining a great painting of Daniel in the lion's den. The picture included one little lion in one corner, and the boy said, "Oh, mamma, there is a little lion that won't get any at all." [Laughter.] So we of the South do not get any at all under this bill. [Laughter.] Having disposed of this great pension appropriation bill, I desire to call attention to a bill introduced by me, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1958) to restore in part proceeds of captured and abandoned property.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That there be appropriated annually, from any money in the Treasury not already appropriated, a sum equal to and not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount now unclaimed and standing to the credit of the account on the books of the Treasury known as "Captured and abandoned property," to be applied for the benefit of disabled and dependent ex-Confederate soldiers, as follows, to wit: On the certificate of the governor of any State that his State has the year previously expended a certain sum for homes or in aid of ex-Confederate soldiers, furnished under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may require, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay over to the proper authority of such State a sum equal to the sum so certified: Provided, That all such certificates shall be presented on or before June 30 of each year: And provided further, That should the total of the amounts of said certificates exceed the sum of the aforesaid 10 per cent, then the several amounts to be paid the several States shall be reduced in proportion.

My friend and colleague [Mr. RIXEY] has introduced a bill, which he discussed yesterday. My bill differs from his bill essentially, as it provides for the return of the money derived from the sale of captured and abandoned property, now standing on the books of the Treasury, no one claiming it, but everybody knowing to whom it belongs, viz, to the people of the Southern States. I will not at this time attempt to discuss it. Suffice it to say that there are some $15,000,000 in the Treasury, and it is with reference to the distribution of that money that this bill makes provision in a just, moral, and equitable manner. As I said, I will not discuss this bill. If I can ever get it before the committee I am satisfied that the equities of it will induce the committee to report it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is anything in what is left of me [laughter], I am a Confederate veteran—a so-called "rebel." [Laughter.] During the war the endearing terms "Yankee" and "rebel" were applied by each to the other. During that time the Yankees often went so far as to call us "damned rebels," and we went so far as to call them "damned Yankees." When you gentlemen on the other side came down in our midst, of course we applied to you the endearing term "damned Yankee," and you applied to us the endearing term "damned rebel," nobody meaning any offense. The old negroes down there absolutely got to thinking that "damned Yankee" was a proper term to use; and General Sherman in his memoirs says that he once overheard an old darky praying, and he said, "Oh, God, bless these damned Yankees." [Laughter.] General Sherman is authority for that.

The distinguished veteran [Mr. GROSVENOR]—I am sorry not to see him in his seat just now—referred in his speech of yesterday to that gallant soldier from Pennsylvania, Gen. HENRY HARRISON BINGHAM. He said that Mr. BINGHAM was full of "rebel bullets." Now, I was about to interrupt him and ask whether he did not mean full of leaden bullets. Then I remembered—my modesty forbade me to say it—I remembered that I had what I call a "Yankee bullet" in me now. And then I knew that that chivalrous gentleman meant no disrespect to the bullets when he called them "rebel bullets." Then my friend from Colorado [Mr. Bell] rose and talked about the glory of the deserters from the "rebel" army. Well, my friends, reconciliation has taken place; and yet we hear everybody talking about "rebels." I was one myself; and here I say I am not ashamed of it. Cromwell was the greatest rebel of his age, yet to-day there are monuments all over England to Oliver Cromwell. Mr. Chairman, the day will not be far distant when there will be monuments in the capital city of this great nation to Robert E. Lee, to Stonewall Jackson, to Stewart, and Forrest, and other Confederate leaders, not as rebels, but as great and grand American soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who would condemn the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Rixey], my colleague, because of the bill he has introduced, for I know that his great aim was to present a measure of benefit, and in its purposes it was as pure and noble as that which could emanate from the breast of any man in America. I might when I deliberately leave Congress—under compulsion [laughter and applause]—I might need a Soldiers' Home for myself. But, seriously, I am not here to discuss his bill pro or con. I have not risen, however, to advocate it, nor to condemn any old Confederate for partaking of its provisions if he saw fit to do so, if it ever becomes a law. But I will say that its passage by those veterans on the other side of this Chamber would be a most gracious act. It would be like planting a sweet rose along the hedges and the pathways that already to a certain extent cross the "bloody chasm." Such privileges need not be taken or enjoyed by anyone on this side who does not choose to avail himself of them.

But, my friends, there is another aspect of that bill which has not been mentioned. I wish briefly to call your attention to it. I assume that no gallant Union soldier, such as Gen. Henry Harrison Bingham, from Pennsylvania, or my friend the Hon. Vespasian Warner, of Illinois, both of whom are laden down with rebel bullets, or the battle-scarred Speaker of the House of Representatives, David Bremner Henderson, who left a leg on the field of battle and went back after enduring the sufferings of that loss to serve his country with one leg as colonel of a regiment, ever looks upon the old Confederate soldier with any degree of bitterness. I do not believe they do. I do not believe they look upon him even with envy. On the contrary, I know that there is a warm spot in their hearts for every one of them.

Call the roll of all the names of all the soldiers in Homes throughout this country and what will you have for an answer? There would be, as if one voice, an answer showing gratitude to

for him to go into. Did you ever think of that? [Laughter.] There would have been no Soldiers' Home throughout the whole land but for the Confederate soldier. Not a single one. [Laughter.] And possibly, if it hadn't been for the old Confederate soldier some of these inmates of the Homes would be shivering in the cold to-day. Yes, but for that old Confederate soldier some dier some of these inmates of the Homes would be shivering in the cold to-day. Yes, but for that old Confederate soldier some of them would be following the plow and hoeing the hills instead of leading lives of happiness and pleasure and rest. [Laughter.] Some of them would be driving wagons in the Western blizzards, some would possibly have come down to be members of Congress. [Laughter.] Some, no doubt, would be extending their remarks on sixty-day notes after maturity. [Laughter.] Some, probably, like Mulberry Sellers, would be planting snowballs for the purpose of raising an ice harvest, or perhaps attempting to dry snow and sell it for salt. [Renewed laughter.]

Yes, my friends, but for that old Confederate soldier all of these things might have happened. There was a Revolutionary war, as we are told; there was a war of 1812, and there were In-these things might have happened. There was a Revolutionary war, as we are told; there was a war of 1812, and there were Indian wars, as well as the war with Mexico. Not one of them could evolve a Soldiers' Home. But it was left for the old Confederate soldier to do the entire work. [Laughter.] Look over the way—I expected to see my big-hearted and the suave sage from Danville, Ill., in his seat. I am sorry he is not there. He lives in Vermilion County, and on the big river of a similar hue, with the Iroquois and Kankakee constituents. I would ask him what would have become of that beautiful modern Home and grounds at Danville, Ill., if it had not been for the good old Confederate soldier? There would have been none, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.] If the Soldiers' Home is such a boon, if it is "a thing of beauty and a joy forever, its loveliness increasing every day." who beauty and a joy forever, its loveliness increasing every day," who is here, and I ask him to stand up, who is here to-day to deny that to the Confederate soldier is due all of the happiness and all of

to the Confederate soldier is due all of the happiness and all of the sunshine to the souls and all the comforts to the bodies of the inmates of the Soldiers' Homes. Look across, if you please, look across the way to that grand monument to the valor of the Confederate soldier called the Pension building.

Look across at that building in this capital city of the nation, where 3,000 clerks daily toil and issue millions of certificates, between the lines of every one of which may be read the words "Remember the old rebel soldier of '61-5." [Applause.] What would have become of those 3,000 employees in the Pension building if it had not been for the old Confederate soldier? But for him perhaps the name of U. S. Grant and that of Stonewall Jackson would never have been placed upon the scroll of immortality. son would never have been placed upon the scroll of immortality. Mr. Lincoln recognized the valor of the Confederate soldier when, on an occasion when the Confederate army was penetrating Pennsylvania, he was telegraphed to by Mr. Curtin, the war governor of that State, in the following words:

Send me 10,000 men and I will stop Lee.

Mr. Lincoln replied to him:

Your stopper is too short.

want to read a few lines from a standard work. If ever Greek met Greek, this record will show that it was in the years 1861 to 1865. If ever soldiers on either side should respect and 1861 to 1865. If ever soldiers on either side should respect and congratulate their opponents, the soldiers of the Union and the Confederate armies should do so. Never has there been such a record. I read from a standard work. If you want to know what it is, I reply it is a volume of my speeches. [Laughter.] What was the mortality shown in that war? If we take the battle of Gettysburg, we find that the First Minnesota lost 82 per cent and the Twenty-sixth North Carolina lost 87 per cent. There is no such record in modern times as that. If you take the Crimean war or the Austria-Prussian or the France-Prussian Crimean war or the Austria-Prussian or the Franco-Prussian war, you will find that the average loss was a little under 3 per cent in some cases and a little over 3 per cent in others; but in the Union Army the loss was 4.7 per cent and in the Confederate army it was 10 per cent. Never has there been such a record in modern times. The One hundred and forty-first Pennsylvania lost 76 per cent, and the Twenty-first Georgia lost 76 per cent. might read other regimental losses equally as startling.

What do the great men who were engaged in this war say? I was captured by my friends, whom we then termed Yankees, about a month before the surrender, and I was put in prison. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant released me after the surrender. I did not have a friend north of Mason and Dixon's line to apply to. After the surrender Grant showed his magnanimity, when a simple letter was addressed to him by my brother, who was adjutant-general then serving on Joseph E. Johnston's staff. He wrote to my brother that I should be released immediately. I say of him that his great achievement was equaled by his magnanimity. He spoke of us before the surrender as people have been forced to speak of us since. At Vicksburg he wrote to Pemberton:

Men who have shown so much endurance and courage as those under your command at Vicksburg will challenge the respect of every adversary.

Again, when he went to Richmond, he declined to enter that city in triumph. He said:

No, I do not care to go. These people feel too keenly already the injury of war, and I do not intend even by my presence to seem to them as one who finds pleasure in viewing the wreck of their beloved capital and country.

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAMB. Will my friend allow life to interrupt him.
Mr. OTEY. Certainly.
Mr. LAMB. I feel very much interested on behalf of the old Confederate soldier and the people of Virginia with relation to the bill offered by my colleague [Mr. Rixey]. Will my friend please tell us how he stands on that bill?

Mr. OTEY. As I stated that I had introduced a bill myself, I expect to support my own bill instead of that bill. As to the question of the propriety of a Confederate soldier accepting at the hands of the United States Government a domicile in the Soldiers' Home, I say that I conceive that he would not relinquish one particle of his self-respect in so doing if it was offered to him; and not only that, but he would be receiving only part of that which already belongs to him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, never in modern times, I say, has there been such valor and heroism displayed by any men as in that civil war. Certainly it would not have been anything to the credit of the Confederate soldier that he achieved victories over a less valorous foe; and no credit to the Union soldier that he overwhelmed a less valiant antagonist. I say there was "glory enough for all," in the language of Commodore Schley; and whilst enough for all, "In the language of Commodore Schley; and whilst as an old Confederate soldier myself I have always been a little ashamed of the so-called Spanish war, just as I hate to see a great big bulldog crush down a poor little poodle [laughter], I do accept the great victory of Admiral Dewey, and the greatest naval battle of the world, which was won by Admiral Winfield Scott Schley. [Applause.] For myself I adopt the words of the old Confederate soldier, who said:

I want to be know'd for just what I was
When I rise up at judgment day;
I want them to say, "There's an old Confed,
And he's wearing the same old gray;"
For I'm not ashamed of it, and that's Not all; and I never shall be,
For the proudest years of my life at last
Were the years that I followed Lee.

Never in the world have there been such soldiers as the Union and Confederate soldiers, and in my opinion there never was such a soldier as the Confederate soldier. I say this because of the then existing conditions, and these conditions can not exist again; consequently his prototype will never appear again in the future. Although no officer of any army ever faced danger more fearlessly Although no officer of any army ever faced danger more fearlessly than did the Confederate officer, although the mortality in no officers of modern times was ever so great, yet he could occupy no greater post of danger than following the Confederate private. Accustomed all his life to command, he knew well how to obey; always obeying implicitly his commanding officer, yet, sir, no regular ever responded with more alacrity to drum tap or moved with more promptitude to the bugle call. His individuality was never lost. He fought with that self-possession and that intelligent thought that, each inspiring confidence in the other, made the aggregation well-nigh invincible.

Mr. Chairman, I will cite for example the Army of Northern Virginia. It was never driven from a field of battle, although always outnumbered, and was met by as good soldiers as were on always outnumbered, and was met by as good soldiers as were on the Continent. But, sir, this army was composed of men whom no danger could appall, no peril awe, no hardships dismay, no numbers intimidate. To them duty was an inspiration, patriot-ism a passion, courage an allurement, and glory a poem. To the Confederate soldier war was not demoralizing, but, on the con-trary, was a school of discipline. He had devastated no fields, desecrated no temples, plundered no people, and always respected

Look at the criminal records, and his name is a stranger to it. Look at the criminal records, and his name is a stranger to it. If the poorhouses had to depend upon him for inmates they would be closed. Few have been behind the bars of a jail, and thank God no cell of a penitentiary shuts out the light of liberty from any soldier that followed Lee; and those who followed Lee were types of those that upheld the starry cross from one end of the Confederacy to the other. He was their exemplar. They saw him lay down his untarnished sword, broken though still bright, his heart broken for his country's work his float follow without the country's work his float follows. his heart broken for his country's woes, his flag folded without a stain, and the agony was not over but just begun as he heard the last shot of Gordon's men, a nation's death cry.

As poor as the poorest, yet rich for want of wealth, for the wealth of a continent lay at his feet seeking recognition; with-wealth of a continent lay at his feet seeking recognition; with-out a home, yet the hinges swung open the doors of welcome to him all over the land; without employment, yet offer of it crowded him beyond his ability to respond; not a hut that would not have welcomed him, not a palace that would not have been honored by his presence; without office, yet the gift of crowned heads yearning for his fame and renown could not tempt him.

He loved his native State, Virginia, and he would have no wealth that she could not furnish, no home she could not supply, no employment she could not give, no office she could not bestow. As I said, Robert E. Lee was the exemplar of the old Confederate private. Grady said of this old rebel:

He was a hero in gray with a heart of gold. God stripped him in prosperity, and inspired him in adversity. Leaving fields running with human blood in April, he saw them green with harvest in June. Ruin was never so overwhelming, restoration never so swift.

I am here to ask no favor for this hero. His name is already on immortality's scroll, and those of us who still remain can join the Southern bard and say:

Land where the sign of the Cross Its shadow hath everywhere shed, We measure our love by thy loss, Our loss by the graves of our dead.

[Loud applause.]
Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit to the consideration of the House some matters in connection with pensions. We devote two days each month to the consideration of special pension bills, and a great many members who have not time to investigate these matters have come to the conclusion that there are too many special pension bills. I am inclined to that opinion myself, Mr. Chairman, but I do not think there are too many under the laws as they stand. I think the laws ought to be amended so as to obviate the necessity of so many, and my main purpose in rising in my place here to-day is to show how we could avoid the necessity of so many special pension bills. One of the matters that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is called upon to wrestle with is the fact that a great many men served in two or more regiments in the armies of the United States during the war of the rebellion, and who are marked as deserters from the first regiment they served in, but were honorably discharged from the last regiment with which they served.

SOLDIERS WITH TWO SERVICES.

Now, in my section of the country I know it to be a fact that many men had no choice as to what regiment they would connect themselves with. They joined the first Union regiment that could be reached. Thousands of them traveled hundreds of miles, oftentimes exclusively at night, in order to reach Kentucky, Ohio, or Indiana, to enable them to enlist in the armies of the United States. Afterwards, when the regiments they joined went down into Tennessee, these same Tennesseans, as good soldiers, as brave men, and as loyal citizens as ever drew the breath of life, preferred to join a regiment where their neighbors and acquaintances were; and so, without asking leave of anybody, they left the regiment they were serving in and joined a regiment in which their neighbors were and served honorably to the end, never for a moment thinking that it made much difference in what regiment they served so they were fighting for the Union.

Now, those men can not get a pension under the act of 1890. Plenty of them served three and four years, and were engaged in many battles, while the men who joined but one regiment and served ninety days, and never saw a battle, and never smelled gunpowder, are, if disabled and honorably discharged, entitled to a pension under the act of June 27, 1890. Isay, Mr. Chairman, that this act is grossly unjust to these brave and patriotic Union soldiers. The Pension Bureau holds these men must have discharges from all the organizations with which they have been at any time connected in order to entitle them to a pension under the act of The result is that we find this class of men applying to the

These men are honorable and patriotic citizens; they served two and three years in the armies of the United States, and many of them remained in the Army until the war closed; and oftentimes the period between their desertion and their second enlistment was only a few days. In one case I have in mind it was less than an hour. The two regiments were side by side, and the man went out of one regiment and enlisted in the second regiment and served faithfully until captured, and died at last in a Confederate prison; and his widow could not draw a pension. This class of cases necessitates applications to Congress for a pension by a private act. We ought to make a general law to cover all of these cases. I have introduced a bill for this purpose and hope it will pass.

CONFEDERATE CONSCRIPTS IN THE UNION ARMY

There is another class of claimants who appeal to Congress by special bills. They are those Southern Union men who in the early part of the war of the Rebellion were conscripted by the Confederate authorities. There were in Tennessee, in North Carolina, in northern Georgia, and in northern Alabama as loyal men as ever breathed the breath of life conscripted in the Confederate Army; and the first chance they got they left the Confederate Army and joined the Union Army, and served in the Union Army faithfully and bravely to the close of the war. These men risked their lives, not only in battle, but risked their lives in another way: If they were captured they were often at once taken out and shot, because they were deserters from the Confederate Army; and, if confined as prisoners, were treated with greater severity because regarded as traitors to the Confederate Army; In those days loyalty to the Union was treason to the

This is a class of men that can not draw pensions under the act of 1890; and if there be one class of men that appeals to the loyal sentiment of this country with more emphasis than any other class it is this very class—the men who were conscripted in the Confederate army in the early days of the war and who after-wards left that army and joined the Army of the United States and fought faithfully under the Union flag until their term of enlistment expired or the war came to a triumphant close. Because, Mr. Chairman, these men not only ran the ordinary risks of battle and disease incidental to a soldier's life, but they also ran the risk when captured of being instantly ordered out to be shot by condemnation of a drumhead court-martial; and this in fact was the fate that many of them suffered, while others were starved to death in Confederate prisons.

I want to say in this connection that the ban of disloyalty has been removed from every other class of citizens in the United States. It has been removed from the men who participated actively in the rebellion as governors, and judges, and members of the Confederate army and Confederate government, and many of them have taken seats in the Congress of the United States. It has been removed from those who served against England in the war of 1812-1814.

THE BAN REMOVED FROM ALL OTHERS.

It has been removed from the men who fought in the Mexican war, and afterwards participated in the rebellion. It has been removed from those who served in the Indian wars. It has been removed from the men who fought in the Spanish war, having previously been in the Confederate army. It has been removed from all the men who suffered any disability while fighting in the Union Army; but it is still affixed to those Union soldiers who, after escaping from their conscript service in the Confederate army, served to the end in the Union Army, but have no hospital record, perhaps never were sick a day, but ready at all times for duty, whether in the camp, or on the march, or on the field of battle, and who gave the United States the benefit of their service from two to four years, and yet they can not draw any pension under the act of 1890. Why? Because they were conscripted in the rebel army, many of them for not more than a month, some of them for not more than a few days.

Many people do not realize what it was to be conscripted into the Confederate army in those days. You were notified to put in your appearance at the county seat on a given day, and if you did not put in your appearance accordingly you were arrested and tried and punished for desertion. Many tried to escape, and some did escape, but hundreds of them were captured and scores shot and some hung. That was the doom that confronted the Union men who were conscripted in those awful days from 1861 to 1863 in the so-called Confederate States. These conscripted men joined the Confederate army as a temporary expedient, aiming to leave at the first possible moment, at the earliest opportunity. And this they did. They joined the Union Army; they served in the battle, not in the hospital; for if they were in the hospital, dis-abled from disease or wounds, they are pensionable. They were soldiers to the end, did the marching, the guarding, and the fight-ing, but suffered no disability, although many of them served three years or more. All served to the end of their enlistment or the close of the war, and yet they can not draw pensions under the act of 1890, while the Northern or Western or Eastern soldier who served only ninety days, and perhaps never crossed the Ohio or the Potomac, can draw a pension under this act.

Mr. Chairman, this is another one of the great injustices that causes men to resort to Congress for special relief, and it is an injustice that this House ought to correct, and correct at once. Why should the fact that a man was conscripted under duress and forced into the Confederate army be imputed to him as a crime, when he left the Confederate army the first time he saw the door open, the first time he saw the fence down, the first time the door open, the first time he saw the fence down, the first time he saw in reach the flag he loved, and joined the Army of his country and fought its battles to the close of the war? Why should the ban of disloyalty be placed on that man? I say it is a disgrace to the United States of America to thus dishonor those heroic loyalists of the Southern country. Ever since I have been in Congress I have been trying to have justice done to these men, and I hope this Congress will pass the bill.

MEXICAN WAR SOLDIERS.

In this connection I want to allude to what was said this morning about the Mexican soldiers not being as fairly treated as the Union soldiers. I deny that statement. I say the Mexican soldiers have been treated better than the Union soldiers.

Every Mexican war soldier who is 62 years of age and served sixty days or was in a battle, and was honorably discharged, is entitled to a pension whether he has any disability or not, while a Union war soldier must have served ninety days, under the act of 1890, and must have a disability. The Commissioner of Pensions estimates that there are 200,000 ex-Union soldiers still living and unpensioned; and it is safe to say that one-half of these, or a hundred thousand, are 62 years of age or over, but notwithstanding that they can not draw any pension unless suffering some dis-There is no service pension for the ex-Union soldier. I care not how faithfully he may have served; I care not how long he may have served; I care not how many battles he was in; there is no service pension for him. He must show a disability; he must show a ninety days' service, and he must show an honorable discharge.

The soldier of the Mexican war, he need not show any disability; all that is necessary for him to do is to show that he was in a battle or served sixty days—not ninety—and has an honorable discharge. Right here I want to say that the day has come when the Union soldiers who served two, or three, or four years and contracted no disability ought to be pensioned. They are the men who did the fighting. They are the men who suppressed the rebellion. They are the men who gave us our country. They are the men without whom no other man in the United States would be pensioned by the United States to-day. Yet these grand heroes are drawing no pension.

NO SERVICE PENSION FOR UNION SOLDIERS.

The men who went to the hospital on account of disability by disease or by wounds are drawing pensions; but the man who stood at the forefront of the fight, who was never in the hospital, who on all occasions was present at roll call, who was always on hand when the time came to make the charge, who was always the first over the "imminent deadly breach"—that man, though he may have served three or four years, is not entitled to a pension. Why? Because he has no disability. Yet the soldier of the Mexican war, when he gets to be 62 years of age, is entitled to a pension of $8 a month, and if he is a poor man, $12 a month. Still we are told on this floor that the Government of the United States is prejudiced against the soldier of the Mexican war and in favor of the soldier of the war for the Union. I say it is not so. The soldier of the Mexican war has under our law higher rights and better opportunities for getting a pension than the soldier of the war for the Union.

But I want it understood, Mr. Chairman, that I do not discount the claims of the Mexican-war soldier. I glory in his patriotism, I honor his valor, I respect his rights and privileges, and I rejoice that he receives the benefits that he does receive. So far as I am concerned I will vote for a law increasing the pension of every Mexican-war soldier to $12, whether he be poor or rich. I say he should have that amount of pension, and if his necessities are great I would give him more. I am not saying anything against Mexican-war soldiers; I am only saying that the soldier of the war for the Union is in some important particulars not receiving equal benefits and rights and privileges with the soldier of the Mexican war. All honor to the soldier of the Mexican war who gave us California and Arizona and Nevada and New Mexico and, indirectly, Texas. All honor to them all. I glory in their patriotism, in their valor, in their devotion to their country; but at the same time I glory in the valor and patriotism of the men who gave us this whole country. And I say that if we are going to draw any line of distinction the Union soldier ought to have the preference. But he is not now given the preference; and that is another one of the causes of the many applications to Congress for special pensions. IRREGULAR SOLDIERS.

There is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and that is the claims of what might be called the irregular soldiers—soldiers who, under the existing law, are not entitled to pensions. In the State of Missouri there were thousands and thousands of men belonging to the State militia who served a whole year battling for the Union. But they served under the flag of Missouri, so to speak; that is, they were never regularly mustered into the Army of the United States. But they served as Missouri militia over a year and served under the orders of the as Missouri militia over a year and served under the orders of the United States. In Kentucky a similar state of affairs existed, many of her militia battling for the United States as United States as United States soldiers. These men ought to be pensioned. Every man of them who incurred disability in the line of duty, and the widow of every man who was killed on the field of battle, and the children of every such man ought to receive a pension by general law. As it is, they have to come as individuals to Congress by special bill.

Mr. BOREING. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that those State troops raised in Kentucky acted under the orders that those State troops raised in Kentucky acted under the orders of the generals of the United States Army. They were ordered out of the State, and they rendered valuable service.

Mr. GIBSON. Exactly; these Kentucky and Missouri troops served under the general officers of the United States. They took their places on the field of battle under the orders of such officers; they fell in their tracks, many of them, from Confederate bullets as did the regularly mustered Union soldiers; but they are to-day denied pensions. The result is that such of those men as were denied pensions. The result is that such of those men as were wounded or contracted disease, and the widows of those who have died, are appealing to the Invalid Pensions Committee by special

UNION SOLDIERS FROM THE SOUTH.

There is another class of these irregular Union soldiers whose claims are entitled to consideration. For instance, those who enlisted from northern Georgia. "What," somebody will say, "Union men in Georgia!" Yes; two regiments of Union men were organized in northern Georgia, and Union men were organized. ized also in Alabama, and all over Tennessee there were local organizations of Union soldiers. They battled for the Union, but were never regularly mustered in the Army of the United States. Take East Tennessee, where General Burnside, by special written authority from Abraham Lincoln, called upon the Union men to rally and organize into companies. He furnished them with arms, and they served from one to two years, at their own expense, sometimes supplying their own ratios, mounted on their own becomes a wearing their own elethers, just as did the herees. own horses, wearing their own clothes—just as did the heroes who won the battle of Kings Mountain and turned the tide in favor of American independence.

These East Tennessee Union soldiers, who were denominated by Burnside "the National Guards of East Tennessee," are to-day not entitled to any pension under our law; and appeals for pensions for those who were wounded or for the widows of those who were killed in battle or who died in Confederate prisons are coming to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. And over in the district of my almost colleague, the Representative from the Eleventh district of Kentucky, whose district adjoins mine—in his district irregular troops, as they might be called, were enlisted and served from six months to two years in the Army of the United States, but many of them, never having been regularly enrolled and sworn in and reported to the War Department, are to-day not entitled to consideration by the Pension Bureau. These are some of the men who are appealing to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for relief.

MEN DISABLED BEFORE MUSTER.

There is another deserving class of soldiers who are entitled to relief by a general law. I refer to those men who enlisted in the Army and were wounded or disabled by disease before muster, and were rejected by the examining surgeon because of the disa bilities previously contracted in the service. These men come before our committee with special bills and ask relief, and I can find no just reason for denying them relief. It was not their fault that they were not mustered at the outset, and their patriotism in serving as soldiers before muster surely ought not to be taken advantage of by the country that got the benefit of their

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state another class of cases that come before the Committee on Invalid Pensions that every man on the floor of this House, I care not on what side of the House he may be, is interested in. The great proportion of the soldiers are becoming old. Many are suffering from disabilities incurred in the line of duty in the service of their county. There is no question of their suffering, but they can not, to the satisfaction of the Bureau of Pensions, prove that the disability was incurred in, or is the result of their Army service. is the result of, their Army service.

The result is that they are drawing only $12 a month. Some of them are blind. Some are afflicted by rheumatism to such an extent that they require the constant attendance and help of another person. Some are paralyzed. Some are suffering from other diseases that make them helpless. Many of these people are dependent upon public charity for support, and yet they can draw only $12 a month. Many of these men insist that their disability only $12 a month. Many of these men insist that their disability is the result of wounds received or diseases incurred while in the Army. They produce their proof. They file the affidavits of their comrades. They bring forward the testimony of their neighbors. They present the statements of the physicians who have waited on them ever since the close of the war. They pile up proof mountain high to show that their disability was incurred in the line of duty in the in the line of duty in the Army, but the Pension Bureau says: "We are not satisfied with the proof."

MEASURE OF PROOF IN THE PENSION BUREAU.

Right here, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the degree of proof which is required by the Bureau. In that Bureau, under its rulings, you must prove your case beyond a reasonable doubt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.
Mr. GROSVENOR. At whose door does the gentleman lay that criticism? I say that there is no law upon the statute books of this country, nor is there any analogy in the law, that justifies any ruling in any Department of that character, if there be such

Mr. GIBSON. I entirely agree with the distinguished gentle-man from Ohio, and am glad indeed that he has risen to make the man from Ohio, and am glad indeed that he has risen to make the statement he has made, because it brings up perhaps for more general information a discussion which took place in the last Congress on this subject with which but few members, I think, are acquainted. I stated on this floor about this time last year that the Pension Bureau required a pension case to be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The attention of the Commissioner of Pensions was called to that utterance on my part, and he advanced a letter to the honorable gentlaman on my right—the gendressed a letter to the honorable gentleman on my right—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor]—denying that there was any such ruling, and saying that if there was he would have it changed as soon as the matter was brought to his attention. Now, I hold in my hand a treatise on the practice in the Pension Bureau, printed in the year 1898. This book is prefaced by the following

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,

Washington, April 9, 1898.

Sir: I have approved, and return herewith, a treatise on the practice of the Pension Bureau, which was submitted by you personally for my consideration. the Pension eration. Very respectfully,

C. N. BLISS, Secretary.

and addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions.

PROOF BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT.

So here is a book submitted by the Commissioner of Pensions to the then Secretary of the Interior, and returned by him to the Commissioner of Pensions and marked "approved." Now, what does this book say with reference to the practice of the Pension Bureau? I call your attention to this language, on pages 20 and 21:

When such parol evidence is filed, the examiner-

An examiner is an officer in the Bureau who passes on pension claims.

When such parol evidence is filed the examiner should call upon the War Department for a report concerning the presence or absence of the affiants at the time it is alleged such wound was received. If the War Department reports them present at that time, such claim is accepted as "legally" established upon the record and parol evidence as stated; provided, from the description of the wound and the facts and circumstances stated in the evidence, no reasonable doubt arises concerning the incurrence of the same.

Again, on pages 31 and 32 I read:

The rule of law laid down by the Secretary is that "neither record nor medical evidence of incurrence or treatment in service is absolutely essential to prove service origin; but an absence of such evidence should be satisfactorily accounted for, as a claim must be established by the best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible." (Vol. 8, Secretary's Decisions, p. 394.) In the same decision "satisfactory" evidence is defined as "sufficient" evidence, and means "that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond reasonable doubt."

So here are two emphatic and distinct declarations that proof beyond a reasonable doubt is required by the Pension Bureau before it will allow a claim for pension.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Evans was Commissioner of Pensions at

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Evans was Commissioner of Pensions at that time too, was he not?

Mr. GIBSON. He was at that time, and he is the man who submitted this book to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval and received it back approved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GIBSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The language of that treatise, in the first language are the gentleman will admit place, is not law, as the gentleman will admit.

Mr. GIBSON. I agree that it is not law anywhere except in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And in the second place it reads to me a little like the utterance of a man who never knew anything about law, and who confuses the use of terms of which he probably does not know the entire effect. He says, for instance, that it must be by the best evidence. Well, we all admit that.

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

PENSION BUREAU RULE OF EVIDENCE NOT LAW.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a common rule of evidence. Then he says it must satisfy the mind. Well, we admit that. And then, when he gets to the use of the expression "beyond a reasonable doubt," that is a statement by the writer of that book. It is not law, and it ought not to be obeyed by any tribunal.

Mr. GIBSON. It is not law anywhere in the United States except in the Pension Bureau, and, Mr. Chairman, that is the last place in the world where rigorous rules of evidence should be anyless in the world where rigorous rules of evidence should be anyless.

place in the world where rigorous rules of evidence should be applied, because that Bureau is not intended to adjudicate strict liabilities between debtor and creditor. It is a Bureau established dangers of campaigns, in siege and in assault, on sea and on land, for four long and bloody years that this same country might live. An honest, just, grateful, and patriotic government does not pay pensions to its heroic defenders as a miser pays his debts, slowly, begrudgingly, complainingly, as though the coin was made of his heart's blood. A sad day will it be for our country when it will be said to the old soldier as he presents his claims to a pension what the duke said of Shylock:

I am sorry for thee; thou art come to answer A stony adversary, an inhuman wretch, Incapable of pity, void and empty From any dram of mercy.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.
Mr. PRINCE. Is it not within the power of Congress to pass legislation so plain that the Commissioner can not insist upon the legislation so plain that the Commissioner can not insist upon the rules of evidence he is now insisting upon?

Mr. GIBSON. That is a conundrum that nobody can answer.

Mr. PRINCE. Why not? Can not the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or some committee, bring in legislation that will make it plain enough so that an applicant will not be required to prove disability beyond a reasonable doubt? I am asking this so that the country may know.

Mr. SULLOWAY. If the gentleman will pardon me—

Mr. GIBSON. I will let the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. SULLOWAY] answer that question.

THE FAULT WITH THE BUREAU AND NOT THE LAW.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Let me give you an illustration. The law provides that a man under certain conditions, which are prescribed, shall be entitled to a pension, whether he was mustered into the United States service or not. In the beginning of the war mustering officers were scarce and men were going to the front year rapidly. Some regiments saved a very and some perwar mustering omcers were scarce and men were going to the front very rapidly. Some regiments served a year, and some perhaps a year and a half, without being mustered. I understand that the present Commissioner of Pensions holds in defiance of that statute, and I should like to know if you can make it any plainer when it says, "whether mustered into the United States service or not." He has recently discovered that a man is not pensionable, even if his head and heels were shot off, unless he was mustered into the United States service.

pensionable, even it his head and heels were shot off, unless he was mustered into the United States service.

Mr. PRINCE. Then it is not the law that is at fault, or the Congress of the United States. It is the fault of the man who will not obey the plain mandate of the statute.

Mr. SULLOWAY. That is exactly my view of it, if you want to know. [Applause.]

Mr. PRINCE. I should like to ask the gentleman who has the floor if that is his view of the law?

Mr. PRINCE. I should like to ask the gentleman who has the floor if that is his view of the law?

Mr. GIBSON. My view of the law is this, and I was just on the point of giving it: The law in all civil cases in all the courts of the Union, State and Federal, is that the preponderance of probabilities shall prevail. That is the law in civil suits, and the law that requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt exists only in the case of a man charged with a violation of the criminal law.

Mr. NEVIN. And that is in his favor.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; that is for the benefit of the accused. Then the State must prove her case against him beyond a reason-

Then the State must prove her case against him beyond a reasonable doubt. The origin of that law was this: When that law originated, a defendant could not be a witness in his own behalf. In the next place, there is a general rule of law that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty; and to over-come those two things the judges held that the Government must make out her case against the defendant whose mouth was thus closed and in whose behalf the presumption existed-that the Government must make out its case against a man charged with crime beyond a reasonable doubt. But in a civil suit, between man and man, whether the amount involved is one dollar or a million dollars, if the plaintiff satisfies the jury by the preponderance of probabilities he is entitled to a verdict. The judges charged juries that if, in weighing the evidence, the scales are equally poised, the plaintiff must fail; but if there be ever so little a preponderance in favor of the plaintiff the jury must find in his favor. Mr. Chairman, this ruling of the Pension Bureau that a claimant must make out his case beyond a reasonable doubt is the cause of a great many applications to Congress for individual relief.

RELIEF FOR THE TWELVE-DOLLAR PENSIONERS

Now, to get back. I was going on to say, when this digression occurred, that a great many $12 pensioners come before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. They bring cases to us showing where they have applied for a pension under the general law. We read the evidence and we are shocked to think that the Pension Bureau should have turned down such a case. Perhaps a many is totally hind shealytally helpless from phaymetism, parally to dispense the bounty and attest the gratitude of a great, magnanimous, and grateful people to men who have deserved it by risking their lives and their health on the field of battle, in prison pens, in winter quarters, during the fatigues, privations, and out his case beyond a reasonable doubt, and gives him only $12 a month under the act of 1890, whereas under the general law he would have been entitled to $50 or $72 a month. The soldier feels outraged; his neighbors feel indignant; they appeal to their Congressman; he files a special bill, and the case comes before the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

I had such a case in my own district. His name was James Webb. His shoulder bone had been broken by a bullet. It resulted, as the surgeon of the Pension Bureau testified, in paralysis of his whole system, the result of which was he had to be treated like a baby, lifted in and out of bed by another person; and the surgeon of the Bureau rated him at $72 per month, but the Pension Bureau held that the disability from paralysis did not result from the bullet wound and gave him only $12 under the act of 1890. I brought the case here by a special bill and Congress gave the soldier $40 a month. Now these are greaterness of the sound. the soldier $40 a month. Now, these are specimens of the cases our committee are called upon to deal with.

Mr. LLOYD. In the case to which the gentleman has referred is it not a fact that the medical department at the Pension Office is responsible for the decision that that individual's disability was not of service origin?

Mr. GIBSON. I do not know that I caught the gentleman's question well enough for me to respond intelligently.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the medical department of the Pension Office is responsible for the occurrences to which he has referred.

Mr. GIBSON. Wiser men than I am say that it is.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE BUREAU.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I have some instances in the district which I have the honor to represent the same as the gentleman has mentioned, which I have given careful investigation, and I find that the Pension Commissioner hides behind the medical department in the Pension Office here. Now, I am disposed. and doubtless the gentleman is, to listen to the physician at home, who has investigated the case and who knows something about the result, whereas the department, when a theoretical case arises in reference to the disability from which a claimant suffers, and which may result in his death, says it was not of Army origin; that it may have originated from influences that occurred after he left the Army.

Mr. GIBSON. That is the fact. The result is, Mr. Chairman, these pensioners appeal to Congress. Now, there are 15 men on our committee. There is not one case out of twenty reported by our committee that is not reported unanimously, Republicans and Democrats all concurring that the soldier's bill ought to be allowed, and our committee is generally of the opinion that most of these cases ought to have been allowed at the Bureau and would have been allowed if the Bureau had applied the true rule of evi-

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the remedy for this state of affairs? Our committee devised a remedy in the last Congress, and reported it, and will report it again in a few days. It gives these men drawing $12 pensions and who are now blind, or palsied, or confined to bed with rheumatism, or afflicted with some other disability that necessitates the regular or periodical attention of a third person, $30 a month. Under the general law they would get from $50 to $72 a month. We propose to give them $30. That will take from this Congress and finite Congress. take from this Congress and future Congresses a great many of these special bills, and at the same time do justice to many most deserving men who are now dependent on the charity of their neighbors, because this great country, with a full treasury, de-nies them that measure of justice to which their injuries and their service to their country entitle them.

TWELVE-DOLLAR PENSIONERS APPEAL TO CONGRESS

Yet in consequence of these failures upon the part of other people. in consequence of these faults in other departments, the Invalid Pension Committee of this House has to bear the whole brunt of the criticism because of the multitude of special pension bills. We are criticised for bringing in bills in these cases when we would are criticised for bringing in bills in these cases when we would be men without hearts, men without gratitude, men without patriotism, men without judgment, if we failed to respond when the evidence brought before us is enough to move the heart of a "grandsire cut in alabaster," much less the hearts of men of flesh and blood. So these criticisms of the Invalid Pension Committee are based—I will not say on ignorance—but based on misinformation or misunderstanding as to the real state of facts and the reason why so many gentlemen of the House are under the necessity of introducing private bills for the relief of their constituents and referring them to the Invalid Pension Committee.

When a man is drawing $12 a month under the new law (the

When a man is drawing $12 a month under the new law (the act of 1890) what does that mean? It means that he served ninety days or more in the Union Army; that he has an honorable discharge, and that he is totally disabled for manual labor, and this disability not the result of any vicious habits. Twelve dollars a month is the highest amount a man can draw under the act of 1890. Many of these $12 pensioners served three or more years; many of them were wounded in battle or diseased in camp; many of them are so disabled as to be helpless, and to need the regular care and help of another person; many of them are blind, or paralyzed, or have lost the use of their limbs, or have become weak of mind. These are the pensioners who are appealing to the Invalid Pension Committee for some increase of their pensions. In many cases they are not only as helpless as babes, but are dependent on public and private charity for the very bread they and their families eat. For how can a family live on 40 cents a day when the head of it is a helpless invalid, and the soldier's wife, perhaps, as old and helpless as he is? And how are they to buy the necessary medicines and pay the doctor for his services?

SPECIAL PENSIONS WORK GREAT BENEFITS

Mr. Chairman, where is the man with so little humanity and so little patriotism as to object to our committee increasing these pensions? And we have been in the habit of giving these helpless $12 pensioners $30 and sometimes $40 a month when, if pensioned $12 pensioners $30 and sometimes $40 a month when, if pensioned under the general or old law, they would get $72 a month.

In the last Congress our committee recommended a bill to give all of these $12 pensioners thus helpless $30 a month, and we will bring forward a similar bill in a few days, and I call upon every patriotic and humane man in this House to give it his support and in this way obviate the necessity of special pension bills in these cases. Pass this measure and then the Pension Bureau can take care of them. [Applause.]

But before I leave the subject of special pension bills. Mr. Chair-

But before I leave the subject of special pension bills, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the money paid out on these bills is a mere grain of sand compared with the mountain of money appropriated every year for pensions. In the last session of Congress only 707 special pension bills became laws, less than two to the member on an average, and the whole cost to the Government was only $10,016 a month, while the amount paid out through the was only $10,016 a month, while the amount paid out through the Pension Bureau last year was nearly $140,000,000; and yet to hear some people talk you would think Congres was bankrupting the Treasury by passing special pension bills and the Committee on Invalid Pensions was guilty of instigating the robbery. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether any $10,000 a month paid out by our Government are more equitably spent, or more honestly due, or more patriotically invested, or do more good, and carry more blessings on their wings than are the $10,000 paid out on these 707 special pension bills. these 707 special pension bills.

THE SO-CALLED "PENSION FRAUDS."

Another matter, Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House to speak about, and that is the so-called "pension frauds." Judging from what one sees in the papers, and hears on this Judging from what one sees in the papers, and hears on this floor, and reads in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, one would think there were about 100,000 fraudulent pensioners and about 20,000 dishonest pension attorneys, and that it was only the sleepless vigilance and tireless energy of the Pension Bureau that prevented the scheming soldiers and rascally attorneys from bankrupting the Government; and that, with all the Bureau's honesty, industrict and the scheming soldiers are described by the scheme of th the Government; and that, with an the Bureau's honesty, houstry, and argus-eyed watchfulness, the sharks were looting the Treasury to an alarming degree.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how many "deserters," "bounty jumpers," "coffee coolers," "camp followers," "spurious widows," "pension sharks," and "Treasury looters" have been caught in the trans set by the Pension Bureau with its 1.500 emcaught in the traps set by the Pension Bureau with its 1,500 employees in the office and 226 special examiners in the field, to say nothing of the 500 clerks in the 18 pension agencies throughout the United States.

Remember there are 403,569 pension claims pending; that last year there were 222,588 new applications filed, and there were sent to the Bureau over a million pieces of evidence; that there are 997,735 pensioners on the roll, and 19,993 attorneys to insti-gate and aid these pensioners in all manner of wicked practices and fraudulent schemes.

What a grand harvest of rascals these 2,226 employees of the Pension Bureau and the pension agencies must have reaped! Judging from the hullabaloo, the average man would not be content to guess less than 25,000 "looters" and "sharks" as the result of last year's catch; and yet what was that catch? I read from the last report of the Pension Bureau: 226 persons convicted, all told, and hardly a soldier in the lot! Yes, instead of 25,000 convictions for violating the pension laws and trying to loot the Treasury, only 226—exactly 1 conviction for each of the 226 special examiners scattered all over the United States, and no catch at all for all the other 2,000 persons connected with the Bureau and its agencies. What a grand harvest of rascals these 2,226 employees of the Bureau and its agencies.

Mr. Chairman, let me read you what the charges were against these 226 violators of the law: False claim, 64; false certification, 26; false affidavit, 16; false personation, 5; perjury, 40; forgery, 18; illegal fee, 26; personating Government officer, 21; retaining pension certificate, 2; prosecuting claims while a Government officer, 4; conspiracy, 2; embezzlement, 1, and attempted bribery, 1.

THE PENSION ROLL A ROLL OF HONOR.

Mr. Chairman, in all the history of the world there can not be found a better record of honest dealing with a rich Government. Out of over a million of persons concerned, either as claimants of pensions or as witnesses therefor, or as officers taking affidavits, or as attorneys or agents assisting in the prosecution—out of over a million of persons concerned only 226 convicted of wrongdoing in a whole year, and yet 2,226 officials of the Government watching, guarding, investigating, and scrutinizing in efforts to discover crooked conduct. One conviction for each 10 detectives, 1 wrong act in each 4,400 persons concerned, and hardly a soldier among them!

And how about these dishonest pension attorneys of whom we hear so much? Last year there were 19,992 pension attorneys on the roll, and during the whole year only 37 were disharred for misconduct. Surely, Mr. Chairman, these clamorous charges against pension attorneys must be mostly false, or the Pension Bureau is not doing its duty to the country in allowing them to continue to practice.

The honest truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the pension roll is a clean and honest roll of honest and deserving soldiers, and honest and deserving widows, children, and parents of dead soldiers; it is a roll of honor and of honorable men and women, and the pension attorneys are a class of honorable men, engaged in an honorsion attorneys are a class of nonorable men, engaged in an nonorable business, and doing their work in an honorable way. And these charges of fraud and rascality so loosely and freely made against the old soldiers and their attorneys is a gross slander and a scurrilous libel, and all that is necessary to cause the great body of the American people to burn the brand of condemnation on the brows of their defamers, and to vindicate the honor of the old soldiers and their attorneys is a full knowledge of all the

OUR SOLDIERS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say some-There is another matter, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say something about while I have the floor, something in reply to some things that have been said on the other side of the House about the soldiers who have gone to the Philippine Islands, and who, it is stated, had to go without knowing what the policy of the country was, the imputation being that they had gone to the Philippine Islands unwillingly. Mr. Chairman, every man who joined the Union Army to go to the Philippines knew what he was going there for the replacement to go to the Philippine Islands to me. there for. He volunteered to go to the Philippine Islands to sustain the flag and the sovereignty and the jurisdiction of the United States. East Tennessee has put 6,000 men in the regular and vol-unteer armies of the United States since the beginning of the war with Spain, three times more than any other section of the United States of equal population, as any doubting gentleman will ascertain who will consult the Adjutant-General of the Army.

It is a matter that has been adjudicated, so to speak, by the War Department, as to my own district, giving me three times my quota of officers, on the ground that my district had furnished three times more soldiers than the average Congressional district; and I have yet to hear of a man from my district whining or com-plaining of the sort of war he was engaged in in the Philippine Islands. [Applause.]

I have no complaints from any of them that they are put to a I have no complaints from any of them that they are put to a work they did not enlist for or volunteer for. They knew what they were going there for, and they are doing the work and doing it well. My colleague from the Nashville district [Mr. GAINES] referred yesterday to the First Tennessee Regiment, a large proportion of whom came from my district. They went to the Philippines, and went there to fight; and so anxious were they to fight that after they were put on shipboard, in order to come home, the time of their enlistment having expired they heard the rumor of time of their enlistment having expired, they heard the rumor of a battle being at hand and demanded that they should be disem-barked in order to engage in it; and they did disembark and did engage in it and won the battle. [Applause.]

PATRIOTISM OF TENNESSEE SOLDIERS.

President McKinley referred to this in one of his public addresses, and in one of his messages to Congress recommended that a medal of honor be given to each one of these soldiers. My people knew what they enlisted for. They love their country; they love its flag; they want its jurisdiction increased; they want to make way for liberty; they believe in the manifest destiny of the American people, and are willing and anxious to carry it out, and they make no whining or complaining. They are there to do all the fighting that is necessary, and they do it as becomes brave and

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman speaks about the Philippine Islands being a healthy place for white soldiers. I want to read to him on that point General Otis's report for 1899.

Mr. GIBSON. I can not yield to the gentleman to read any reports. I have not said a word about the health of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GAINES of The Control of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman would not want the truth read.

Mr. GIBSON. I am not afraid of the truth, but I object to any Democratic speech being injected into the belly of my speech. [Laughter.] The gentleman can talk in his own time, he can make his own speech, he can read his own book, he can use his own voice in his own time, but he can not consume my time. [Laughter.] So far as I am concerned, so far as my people are concerned, we are for holding the Philippine Islands, and many of my constituents question the loyalty of some of the men who do not want to hold them. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is where my people stand on this great question. They have done more to spread the area of the United States than any other State of the Union. It was the people of Tennessee who peopled Texas and filled the army of Sam Houston, who himself was a Tennessean, and won the battle of San Jacinto, which resulted in the independence of Texas, and afterwards its annexation to the United States.

It was James K. Polk, a Tennessee President, that brought on the Mexican war, and Tennessee soldiers occupied the forefront in that glorious campaign against the land of the Montezumas, that resulted in the addition of California, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah to the domain of the United States. And the same spirit is exhibited by them to-day in regard to the Philippines. They want to uphold the flag, to sustain the sovereignty of our country, and to make good the words of William McKinley in those islands.

UPHOLDING OUR FLAG A TEST OF LOYALTY.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. GIBSON. Yes; for a question.
Mr. WHEELER. I understood the gentleman to say that "We"—meaning, I suppose, his colleagues on that side of the House—"question the loyalty of every citizen of the Republic who does not desire to hold the Philippine Islands."

Mr. GIBSON. I said that many of pure constitute to hid.

Mr. GIBSON. I said that many of my constituents did.
Mr. WHEELER. Do you speak for your constituents?
Mr. GIBSON. I have uttered my words, and I stand by them.
Mr. WHEELER. What does the gentleman individually think

Mr. GIBSON. I agree with my constituents. [Laughter and

Mr. WHEELER. If I understand the gentleman, he thinks that every man who regards as unwise and impolitic the permanent annexation of the Philippine Islands to this Republic is unpatriotic. Is that true?

Mr. GIBSON. I said many of my constituents question his loyalty, and that I agree with my constituents. Those are my words.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will pardon me for saying

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will pardon me for saying that I question not only the loyalty, but the intelligence, of a man who will give utterance to so foolish a sentiment on the floor of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GIBSON. I have heard such language all along the line. I have become used to it. From 1861 down to this day the Democratic party in the South has undertaken to brand every man who loves his country as "ignorant." That cry was brought against all our leaders in and out of Congress. It was brought against Andrew Johnson. He was charged with being an ignoramus.

Mr. WHEELER. The brand was worn on the forehead by every man in the South professing the same political loyalty as the gentleman does.

THE NEW ISSUE OF SOUTHERN DEMOCRATS.

Mr. GIBSON. It has been common with the extreme men of

Mr. GIBSON. It has been common with the extreme men of the South—the extreme Democrats—to charge the Union men of the South with want of intelligence, and I hurl the epithet back into the face of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, "the gentleman from Kentucky" is perfectly willing to have the epithet hurled back at him. But I do not care to be placed in a false position. I have not accused any man loyal to the Union cause in the South of being ignorant. On the contrary, some of the most intelligent men of the South were loyal to the Union. What I am maintaining is that there are some citizens of the Republic, patriotic and intelligent, who believe that the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands, situated 7,000 miles away in the bosom of the Pacific, will work great harm and detriment to our people here, and to stand up great harm and detriment to our people here, and to stand up and question the loyalty of men who feel that way displays both ignorance and partisanship.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have discovered long ago that the young Democrats of the South who never saw anything of the civil war and never had any of the experiences of the war times are much more extreme and much more bitter than are the men who wore the Confederate uniform. Whenever I strike a man who wore the Confederate uniform I ordinarily strike a man of broad mind and liberal ideas; but a good many of the men who were begotten when the war virus was at its height are now exhibiting traits of character—traits of partisanship and extreme views-such as are not entertained by the older men who served in the Confederate army; and the gentleman from Kentucky is a specimen of the new issue. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHEELER. Why, Mr. Chairman, even the Bible tells us to answer a fool according to his folly. We are following in the wake of the gentleman and those he speaks for in his extremism.

Mr. GIBSON. I feel Mr. Chairman, under chlication to the

Mr. GIBSON. I feel, Mr. Chairman, under obligation to the House for giving me an opportunity to bring to its attention the various grounds of the individual pension claims brought for relief before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I will not trespass on its time further by engaging in an unseemly wrangle with the gentleman from Kentucky. Our committee will have general bills before the House which, if passed into laws, will do away with the necessity for many of these special pension bills. I hope the House will give a pensionable status to these five classes of or Union soldiers. of ex-Union soldiers:

PENSION LAWS THAT SHOULD BE PASSED

First. Those Southern Union men who were conscripted into the Confederate army, but escaped and joined the Union Army and served therein long and faithfully until honorably discharged. Second. Those soldiers who abandoned their first military service, but reenlisted and served long and faithfully and until honorably discharged in another organization

Third. Those who served long and faithfully as State militia or as irregular soldiers, but were never mustered into or mustered out of the service of the United States.

Fourth. Those who served after enlistment, and were wounded or diseased while so serving, and were refused a muster in because of the disabilities thus incurred.

Fifth. These new drawing $\frac{1}{2}$ a weath wide the set of $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{2} or injuries as to need constant nursing, so as to give them an increase to $30 a month.

If all this is done, few will be the cases, Mr. Chairman, where any Union soldier will be obliged to apply to Congress for special relief. The thousands of these special bills show the necessity for the general relief I have alluded to. Let us, Mr. Chairman, do full justice to all the men who served in the Union Army. They stood by their country when their country needed their help, and now let their country stand by them when they need their country's help. [Applause.]

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the discussion upon the purposes, features, and philosophy of the bill introduced by my friend from Virginia has indicated, I think, that if we have not arrived already, we are at least approaching the period of time when the views of gentlemen upon the one side or the other and their judgment upon a question of this character may be con-their judgment upon a question of this character may be considered without prejudice.

Mr. BARNEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Cértainly.

Mr. BARNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the general debate be closed at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri. I make that request, Mr. Chairman, for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouris?

very few moments to call the attention of the House to one feature of this discussion.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the features, purposes, and philosophy of the bill introduced by my friend from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] to provide for the admission into the National Soldiers' Homes of such of the poor, helpless, dependent confederate soldiers, if any, as may choose to enter has indicated, I think, that if we have not yet arrived at we are at least drawing near to the time when the men and the events of the great war between the States, as well as the agencies and motives which gave rise to that tremendous conflict and directed the movements of armies and of men in and through it, may be discussed and considered without passion, and the judgment made up comparatively free from prejudice.

The question of the value of a pension to the recipient is some-times of doubtful solution, but the value of a home to a broken man, in the declining years of his life, when there is no other refuge for him, is something about which there can be no doubt. Unfortunately many of those who receive pensions do not make the best use of them, and, unfortunately, not a few come to rely solely upon the pension for support, instead of exerting and applying themselves to secure a living independent of it or in consection with it. These truths are illustrated of the security of nection with it. These truths are illustrated very often by individual examples. I myself have seen scores of them. While I have seen many men, the recipients of pensions, devoting them-selves actively and energetically to the ordinary pursuits and du-ties of life, unfortunately, like many others, I have seen a number relying for subsistence upon their pensions, and not exerting themselves usefully as they might have done, as they otherwise would have done, and as would have been good for them and for their families and for their communities. Side by side with some of these men I have seen those who served in the other army some of these men I have seen those who served in the other army and draw no pensions, braving the trials and adversities of life and making their way without the pensions quite as well as those who are the recipients of them. I have seen them battling along in sturdy self-reliance, sustained by pride and their own individuality, carried forward by their own industry and self-denial, and I have seen their children grow up at their firesides, inspired by the example of heroic sires, to pursue the pathway of life as their fathers have shown them how to tread it.

When it comes to the question of a home for the disabled the

When it comes to the question of a home for the disabled, the poor, the friendless, and the helpless, when the years of life are gathering heavily upon them, when the shadows are growing long, and when the waters of that river that all must cross are sounding nearer and more distinct; then there is nothing that appeals so soothingly to the broken or careworn heart, there is nothing that is so helpful to the distressed and the forlorn, as the protection of home—a shelter, an abiding place, where the ruder storms of life can not come, and where some of the peacefulness and kind-liness of Christian charity may be known.

Before this time, upon this floor, I expressed my opinion that there would be nothing unpatriotic, nothing reckless, nothing wrong, in opening the doors of the Soldiers' Home to the soldier of the Confederacy as well as to the soldier of the Federal Army. I know very well that the Confederate has not asked this.

know very well that the Confederate has not asked this. I do not know but that a large part of the sentiment of the Confederate soldiers is against it. But need such a thing be asked, if it is just and right, in order that it be granted?

It is said that but few of the Confederates would enter the Homes. I presume that is true. Thirty-seven years of battling with all the elements, thirty-seven years of independent existence, relying upon their own unaided exertions for what they receive and what they are only they excluded the veterate to a life of principal what they are in the present the second what they receive relying upon their own unaided exertions for what they receive and what they enjoy, have so inured the veterans to a life of privation and of energy that I suppose comparatively few of them, even in their declining years, would seek the shelter of the Home, if the doors were thrown open. But if they who would enter be few, is that an argument against opening the Homes for their admission? Would you open them more readily if you knew that multitudes would crowd in? Instead of being an argument against, that is an argument for the proposition made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Rixey].

Some think that it is casting a reproach upon the Confederate soldier to admit him when broken and needy, and when he chooses of his own volition to go into the National Soldiers' Home. Modestly and with deference for the opinions of others who ought to know better than I, I think that must be a mistaken view. The know better than I, I think that must be a mistaken view. The Confederate who has been fortunate in the affairs of this life, who enjoys exalted official position to-day, with the emoluments attached to one position or the perquisites attached to other posi-Mr. BARNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to sk unanimous consent that the general debate be closed at the lose of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri. I make hat request, Mr. Chairman, for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I object. I want only a technical to one position or the perquisites attached to other positions, who is at ease, who has opportunity and affluence, can very readily repel the suggestion of opening the doors of these Homes to the weary, broken, distressed, homeless, shelterless, friendless soldier, once the personification of valor in gray, who has all of real life behind him, and who is to linger only a few days or months or years upon the shores of time, until he shall cross over to that broad and effulgent land of freedom and equality, where the question will not be "What uniform did you wear? Were the question will not be "What uniform did you wear? Were you in civil or in military life? Were you rich or were you poor? Did you go down to the grave with all your limbs, or were they scattered over the battlefields, so that you fell, a maimed remnant of manhood?" but where the questions probably will be "What was your life? What was your spirit, what was your purpose, what was your achievement, according to your opportunity?" I can understand very well how persons favorably situated upon a pinnacle of pride may repel any suggestion of relief when they need none; but why should it be denied to those who do need it, and who perhaps would avail themselves of it? All the veterans and who, perhaps, would avail themselves of it? All the veterans of the war upon either side will soon pass off this stage of action. The Federal soldier, with the mistakes, accidents, and chances here and there which must always exist under general laws, already is well provided for by the Government. Shall a few aged Confederates, battered in the storms of war and of life, find shelter in the Homes of the nation, built and sustained, in part, by

I was a little surprised to hear one gentleman say, in the course of the running debate yesterday, that the purpose of the Confederate soldier was to destroy the Government. Perhaps that was his purpose and the purpose of a great many; but, as I have read history, and as I have gathered the views of the Confederate soldier from the utterances of many men who served in the Confederate army, I conclude that under two heads might be grouped the theories and purposes of most of the soldiers of the South. Those who led in speech, perhaps those who were instrumental at the outset in bringing on the clash of war, believed implicitly in the theory of secession. They believed in the right of a State to withdraw from the Union whenever it might choose to do so. According to their notion, the time for the dissolution of the Union had arrived, the time for the withdrawal of States had

That was the Southern theoretic view. I am not going to discuss or defend it; it is useless to denounce it. That was the view of the Southern leaders, and I am merely mentioning it as a historic fact

A good many of the rank and file of the Southern army, as I understand it, were men who did not indulge in theories, men like the plain people of the South, the plain people of the North, the East, and the West of to-day. Surely thousands who followed the Confederate banner did not have any fine-spun theories about government; did not have any studied convictions upon the right and wrong of secession, or about fidelity to the Union, or States rights. They found themselves in 1861 confronted with invading armies; they faced actual war. War had not come of their choosing, nor in carrying out their theories. The rank and file faced conditions, not theories.

War had come, and that which they called home, their own firesides, were threatened by an invading army. They arose in large part, as men would do in every section of this Union, to de-fend their homes and families. The battles that raged in the land beyond the Potomac were among, and, as many conceived, for Southern homes. The men of the South, in the main, did not fight to destroy the Union; did not fight to destroy the Government of the United States; but, as they conceived it, to defend their homes, because an army opposed to them and their section was at the threshold of home; because the fireside was invaded;

because they believed their duty was to stand and fight for country, as they knew it and loved it.

Take the case of General Lee. Offered, as we are told, and as I believe, the supreme command of all the armies of the United I believe, the supreme command of all the armies of the United States; the man selected by his superior officer, General Scott, to lead; the man pointed out by his genius and his splendid soldierly bearing and lofty attainments and superb manhood—selected by common consent as the prospective leader of the armies of the Union; a man who was opposed to secession, not believing in an atom of the doctrine, repudiating all of it; and yet when his beloved Virginia went out of the Union, when war was carried across the Potomac and raged upon the fields of Virginia, according to his perception of duty to his country, in the sense in which he understood it, comprehending home and kindred and the restring place of the bones of ancestors; with his conception of duty, ing place of the bones of ancestors; with his conception of duty, as lofty and as holy and with purpose as single and unselfish as ever induced a man on this earth to action, this man of great renown as soldier and gentleman in the course of time came, first, to lead the armies of Virginia, and then the armies of the South.

Now, then, from the judgment of duty of such a man, from the entiments which actuated a large share of those who followed him, we can not believe that the writer of the true history of the great American civil war will say that the Southern people sought the destruction of this Government. They sought a dissolution of the Union and the organization of two republics where before there had been but one.

The war closed thirty-seven years ago. A large share of those who participated in it have gone to their long home. And, now, since the suggestion has been made, and since the House, or some members of it, have been talking about it, is it not worth while.

members of it, have been talking about it, is it not worth while, in charity, in justice, and in generosity, to consider whether there is not something of merit in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Virginia? Where does it lack merit?

Who is it that begrudges the pittance that will be required to support the handful of Confederate soldiers, broken, spiritless, hopeless, wandering down toward the final place of departure from this life, the grand exit? Who grudges the few dollars—the comparatively few dollars—to be expended in their maintenance for a short time in the Soldiers' Home? For one, I do not. If they do not choose to avail themselves of the provision when made they need not, and the generous deed by which provision is made for them cannot prove evil.

I was much pleased, Mr. Chairman, with the spirit and temper in which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] presented his views upon this subject, and I was much pleased also with the views of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDER], who was a subject and the spirit in which they were spoke upon the same subject, and the spirit in which they were presented.

It seemed to me from what they uttered and the way they spoke that they were typical of the better sense and the better sentiment of the American manhood and statesmanship of the day. They may be wrong and I may be wrong. I believe they are right, and in view of all the little bickerings of partisanship and all the petty animosity which ought to have been laid away in the grave to these many years, to my mind it is pleasing that gentlement can grise here and across the side and foregoing partisan goal but can arise here and across the aisle, and foregoing partisan zeal but remembering humanity, can glory in the common manhood of the American soldier. In such humane sentiments, so kindly expressed, I fancy I can trace the bow of promise of the dawning of a fairer and better day.

How great is our country, how bright our prospects, if we will do as we ought to do. And how small and narrow must we be if we concentrate ourselves in opposition to a few broken, maimed men, who were gallant soldiers, animated by purposes as unselfish and as high, according to their conceptions of duty, as ever animated men! How far from the spirit of liberality and generosity that for nineteen hundred years has been gathering force and momentum must be that which proscribes a few poor, old, desolate, friendless soldiers for the fruitless, yet fruitful, valor displayed nearly forty years ago; which proscribes, for the faithfulness of more than a generation of peaceful manhood and citizenship, the few wanderers that are yet left upon these shores of time!

Why, Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come with many (and I may be pardoned if I think they are the broader-minded and loftier spirited of our kind) I wish the time had already arrived—for all—when in the North and the South, the East and the West, there is a common sentiment of pride in the glory and manconcentrate ourselves in opposition to a few broken, maimed men, Vest, there is a common sentiment of pride in the glory and manhood of the American soldier of the war of the sixties. I see it in nood of the American soldier of the war of the sixtles. I see it in the old Federal soldier, as was evidenced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER], in the remarks that do credit to his head and heart, and tarnish not the luster of his valor as a soldier. I see it here and there all over the land. I see it in the private from the ranks, in the good fellowship that pervades the neighborhood, in the kindly spirit that gives to the Confederate the helping hand of the Federal soldier, and to the Federal the aid of the Confederate as connectually an experience. ing hand of the Federal soldier, and to the Federal the aid of the Confederate, as opportunity may offer or necessity demand. I see it in the fine exhibition of patriotism and devotion to country recently displayed in the war with Spain, when there was truly no North, no South, no East, no West; but one lofty purpose, one great and glorious country, the sons of which came from the four quarters of the Union and united under the old flag to fight together the country's battles. And the time is coming (I believe it is here now with a great many), it is truly coming—if we do not realize it our children will, or our children's children in the coming generation—when some of the men of the South, some of the leaders of the South, will be pointed to, North and South, East and West, aye, in every land and age where love of nobility in manhood shall abide, as the brightest ornaments of our race, in all the course of time. all the course of time.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in all the Christian era there has not arisen a purer, loftier Christian leader of men, with all the better elements of manhood at once so tenderly, so bravely, so grandly blended—a nobler or more magnificent specimen of the best that manhood can do in its proudest and most glorious and most successful moments—than Gen. Robert E. Lee. [Applause.]

Now, then, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this Rixey bill ought

Whether it will pass I do not know; but for one, whether to pass. Whether it will pass I do not know; but for one, whether it be popular or unpopular, whether it be received with favor or disfavor, I hesitate not to say that what it proposes I believe to be right. I believe that it appeals to the best elements of our human nature. On broad American principles, I believe there is no valid or reasonable objection to it. I am perfectly willing, here and now—and elsewhere, unless my sentiments on the subject change, and I think they will not—to stand by the bill and the advocacy and support of it. I believe that the American people are a chivalrous people; I believe they are a kindly people; I believe they are a broad-minded people; and I also believe that in the great American heart there can be no enduring objection to the proposed home for the homeless.

Would any more Homes be needed if the bill were passed? so, build them. There can be no greater charity to the Federal soldier—there can be nothing better for the soldier of the North or the soldier of the South—than to furnish him a home when he finds no home elsewhere. Far better that than to dispense pensions with a lavish hand, or to deal them out sparingly. It is more just and comforting to furnish these old soldiers with the best substitute possible for the surroundings of the household, where the blasts of winter can have no terrors for them, where tender memories may be revived in the peaceful abode of plenty and comfort, where the twilight quiet may be undisturbed by the gnawing of hunger or the shivering of age in rags, where the gallant veterans, their war-worn uniforms laid away, may prepare, a proud nation's wards, for the final grand march across the river, and for the rest which shall be eternal and unbroken alike for the soldiers of the North and the soldiers of the South who have tried to follow the Master.

who have tried to follow the Master.

Kindly, generously, patriotically, help them and cheer them, the heroic old men in gray as well as the heroic old men in blue—glorious Americans all—as they march on, to "cross over the river and rest in the shade of the trees." [Applause.]

Mr. SNODGRASS obtained the floor.

Mr. BARNEY. While I think there is no purpose to restrict general debate upon this bill, yet I believe there is a general disposition to try and close it this afternoon. We have been pretty liberal in allowing time for the discussion of this measure. I therefore selvengal debate on the bill therefore ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be closed at half past 4 o'clock to-day.

There was no objection; and it was resolved accordingly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, the sentiments just uttered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] are solemn and beautiful and uttered in his own inimitable style. It is under the spell and inspiration of such sentiments that legislators are sometimes moved to reach out and exercise power that it is dangerous to exercise, if not entirely unwarranted. If the granting of pensions and the maintaining of Soldiers' Homes is a charity which the United States has power to establish and maintain in the States, then indeed it would seem to be perfectly proper, right, and patriotic to charge the Government with the expense of maintaining indigent Confederate soldiers in their declining years.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have always been taught to believe that the right to pension soldiers and to maintain Soldiers' Homes was justified not upon the ground of charity, but upon the ground of the exercise of a proper governmental power. The Government can pay soldiers in the form of pensions as compensation for services rendered; the Government can maintain them in Soldiers' Homes in discharge of an obligation which rests upon the Government to take care of them after they have rendered the Government a service. But if this is to be looked upon as an exercise of charity, then, indeed, there would seem to be no reason for confining it to Federal and Confederate soldiers, but, if this is a proper expenditure of the people's money, let us open the Soldiers' Homes not only to the Federal and Confederate soldiers, but to every worthy citizen of the United States and of the States where these institutions are to be maintained who is honorable and upon whom the hand of affliction has been laid so heavy as to reduce him to a condition of poverty and need.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of entering into a general discussion of the pension laws. I have tried since I have been in Congress to do something for the soldiers of the Mexican war upon the ground that in years gone by they have Mexican war upon the ground that in years gone by they have rendered their country a service and are now entitled to their country's more just recognition. It was stated by the gentleman from Michigan and by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. Gibson] that the soldiers of the Mexican war have been more abundantly than even the Union soldiers of the Federal war. I that the soldiers of the Mexican war have been more abundantly provided for than even the Union soldiers of the Federal war. I believe such statements are without foundation.

I am not disposed to quibble with my friends about the name to be applied to the pension which we give our soldiers. It has been stated, I believe, by my colleague from Tennessee that the soldier of the Mexican war is the only soldier now receiving a service pension. I want to state that he is receiving a disability pension based upon a service qualification and that the Federal soldier based upon a service qualification, and that the Federal soldier under the law of 1890 is receiving also a disability pension based upon a service qualification. I want to place in the RECORD for the benefit of those who may wish to take the trouble to investigate this matter these two statutes and to call the attention of the House to the discrimination in these two acts against the sol-diers of the Mexican war. The act of January 29, 1887, provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States who, being duly enlisted, actually served sixty days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, and the surviving widow of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become 62 years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependence herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

SEC. 2. That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, and payable only from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto, or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month.

I have just read sections 1 and 2 of the act of January 29, 1887, to be found on page 75 of the compilation of the Army and Navy pension laws

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been an amendment of this act which constitutes it a disability pension based upon a service qualification. This amendment was made by the act of January 5, 1893, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of every pensioner who is now on the rolls at $\frac{3}{2}$ per month on account of services in the Mexican war, and who is wholly disabled for manual labor and is in such destitute circumstances that $\frac{3}{2}$ per month are insufficient to provide him the necessaries of life, to $12 per month.

Now I wish to call attention to the disability pension act of 1890, which grants a pension based upon a service qualification. I read section 2 of that act, to be found on page 87 of the volume already referred to:

referred to:

Sec. 2. That all persons who served ninety days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapactates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month, and not less than $6 per month; * * * and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office, after the passage of this act upon proof that the disability then existed, and shall continue during the existence of the same: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Pension Office, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, showing themselves entitled thereto, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim and receiving his pension under any other general or special act: Provided, however, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed under this act.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the difference between these two acts. In the first place, it is only necessary for the Federal soldier to show that he has served a certain number of days in the Federal Army and that he is either mentally or physically incapacitated to earn a support by manual labor. Now, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that that man may have the support of his relatives, notwithstanding the fact that he may have a support from an income outside of his ability to earn a living, he can qualify himself for the pension if he can show himself physically incapacitated from earning a living by reappeal labor. by manual labor.

I ask your attention to the declaration which must be made by the Mexican soldier and the proof. He must not only show that he is partially incapacitated, but that he is wholly incapacitated for manual labor, and must show also that he is in such destitute circumstances as that the $8 a month will not afford him the necessaries of life, before he can get the increase the $12 fixed by the law. Now, in the one case you can have the Faderal by the law. Now, in the one case you can have the Federal soldier get his $12 a month by showing physical incapacity to earn a living by manual labor, but in the case of the Mexican

Mr. GIBSON. Will my colleague allow an interruption?
Mr. GIBSON. The Mexican soldier draws a pension, the gentleman will remember, when he gets to the age of 62 years.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I know that, and I am making no question of the liberality of the Government in that particular. I am only showing the discrimination that is made between these two classes. Mr. GIBSON. I agree with my colleague that the Mexican sol-

Mr. GIBSON. I agree with my conteague that the Mexican sor-dier should be advanced to the maximum of $12. Mr. SNODGRASS. I am glad my friend takes that position. I will state that I had a conversation also with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who also favors that proposition. Now, I have introduced the bill, and it is my purpose simply to place the Mexican soldier on a plane of equality with the Federal soldier in the disability pension cases, and that the pension shall pass to him without this pauper oath which the Mexican soldier is required to take at present; and I hope that I will have the support of my colleague from Tennessee and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio in getting that bill passed through the House the House

I thank the House for its kind attention. [Applause.]
Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I wish to voice the sentiments of the Confederate soldiers of this House, as well as those of the Southern States, and their wives and children.

Southern States, and their wives and children.

The bill introduced yesterday by my colleague from Virginia [Mr. Rixey] proposes a relief for the Confederate soldier that he has not asked for, and a charity that he will politely and respectfully decline. No man in this House appreciates more highly than I do the splendid qualities of head and heart of my friend from the Eighth district. It was the impulse of the latter, and not the judgment of the former, that dictated this measure.

My friend lives on a splendid estate overlooking the battle-ground of Fleetwood Hill, or "Brandy Station," where 10,000 mounted men on either side fought one of the heaviest cavalry engagements of the war.

engagements of the war.

Some of you have heard the question repeatedly asked, in derision during the war and in pleasantry since, "Did you ever see a dead mule or a dead cavalryman?"

Had you been at Brandy Station on July 9, 1863, your curiosity would have been satisfied, for the Federals reported a loss of over 900 killed and wounded, and the Confederates suffered a loss of nearly 700.

My friend's luxuriant grain waves over the soil that drank in the life's blood of those noble men. Has he been reading of their heroism, not surpassed in ancient or modern times? Has he listened to the stories of the survivors until his youthful imagination is fired? Or has he been haunted in his night dreams by the spirits of these departed heroes when they returned to view the ground where their earthly bodies faced the mortal perils of the battlefield?

Then we will excuse him for this beautiful day dream by which he would unite the "blue and the gray" and put them in one home and one camping ground. It is the unexpected that always happens. Who would have thought that the coolest, the calmest, and most philosophical of the members of this body from Virginia would have been the first to be moved by a sentiment so lofty; the first to take a step in advance of the generation in which he lives; the first to take counsel of his imagination rather than his

You will remember that my friend admitted that he had not consulted the living. I therefore draw the conclusion that he has been seeing visions around Brandy Station, where brave men of the North and chivalric sons of the South illustrated the valor of the American soldier; where nightly their spirits gather to view the scenes their bodies enacted and realize in their new estate what it was impossible to see in the old—that one side of the statue around which they struggled so gloriously was ornamented with silver and the other with gold.

But, then, Mr. Chairman, there comes to the aid of my Virginia colleague the splendid and talented gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. Was he a soldier? Has he voiced the opinions of the brave men of his State who risked their lives and spilled their blood for Southern independence, or the views of that noble soldiery from the same State who fought as bravely for the maintenance of the Union?

The wrapt attention given the gentleman from Missouri to-day, when he could not have had the full sympathy of one-third its members, is another tribute to his genius and his eloquence.

They heard him, too, in a new rôle. He is often critical. His scathing sarcasm and bitter invective have pierced the weak spot in the country of the c in the argument of many a political opponent. To-day he is as mild as a May morn, as gentle as a lamb, as persuasive and complacent as a young and enthusiastic lover. This has been to me a day of surprises, Mr. Chairman. Who would have supposed that the calm and philosophical gentleman from Missouri had so much of the ideal in his nature? If I had not known to the contrary, I should have been forced to the conclusion that my friend had entered the ministry.

I grant you that sentiment of the right and pure sort is man's best heritage this side of the tomb and his only hope beyond.

But in this mundane sphere we must deal with human nature as we find it and not as we frame it by fancy in our day dreams or picture it in language that appeals to an æsthetic taste and glowing imagination.

The grand Commonwealth of Missouri furnished about 100,000 soldiers to the South and nearly as many to the North.

I have heard my friend [Mr. DE ARMOND] on this floor, in his choice English, for which he is so famous, picture the home life in his State, where the families of the Union and Confederate soldiers were united in matrimony, and from these unions had sprung splendid young men and beautiful women.

I can well see that the old soldiers of such families, if driven to the necessity, might mingle together pleasantly in homes provided by the Government.

But what are the facts in the State of Missouri? The legislature of that State appropriates money for the homes of Confederate soldiers and Union soldiers and they are kept separate and apart. You see those wise legislators deal with human nature as they find it in Missouri.

What else does my friend say? We were moved to tears as he drew a sad picture—all the sadder because oftentimes true—of the unfortunate, hopeless, and disconsolate old soldier seeking a shelter to protect him from the storms of winter. That is all right; but how is it, my friends, when this old soldier feels that he is the recipient of a charity, and that he has not rendered a "quid pro quo" for his home? How will he feel then?

Now, what will be the practical workings of this "benevolent assimilation" which it is proposed to establish?

When you throw these men together, the Endered soldiers will assimilation" which it is proposed to establish?

When you throw these men together, the Federal soldiers will say: "I am at home. I won my right here in the forefront of battle, striving to preserve the Union. Why are you here, Johnny Reb? If your side had won, where would I be now? You have not won your way here. You are a charity patient."

And I can fancy I see now some tall, gaunt old North Carolinian replying: "Well, we'uns killed you'uns in the army, and we'uns will kill you'uns again." [Laughter.] That will be the practical working of this newborn charity.

Now we will look at this question from another standpoint. I listened attentively to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARD-NER] this morning, and I concur in a great deal that he said. I was particularly struck with the note of warning to that side of the House. Gentlemen, heed the warning. We must not open the House. Gentlemen, heed the warning. We must not open any wider this pension door. We on this side would not have you open it to bestow a charity on the Southern soldiers. That soldier for the most part is as great a hero in peace as he was in war. This I would show you from indisputable facts if my time permitted.

What is the amount you are asking for now in the pending bill? Why, something like $140,000,000—more than the war budget of Germany or of France—and it is being increased continually by the applications of the soldiers of the Spanish-American war. I heard it stated on the floor to-day that 80 or 90 per cent of the soldiers in that war ware applicable. They have not all war. I heard it stated on the floor to-day that 80 or 90 per cent of the soldiers in that war were applicants. They have not all followed the patriotic example of the two sons of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Garder]. That gentleman said he made his bow to the Confederate soldier. In return I send my compliments and best wishes to his two gallant sons. I am proud to say we can duplicate them in Virginia.

In the very last conversation I had with the late lamented President McKinley—who by his gentle complacency won the esteem and confidence of the members of this side, as he had by skillful statesmanship bound to himself with books of steel the members.

and confidence of the members of this side, as he had by skillful statesmanship bound to himself with hooks of steel the members on that side—he remarked: "You must have a large number of fine young men in your State." I replied: "Yes, Mr. President; you know they are the sons of the soldiers who met you in battle on many fields in the Shenandoah Valley."

The pension burden, Mr. Chairman, is increased by every little skirmish reported from our possessions in the Orient; by the dying in heavitals: by every ship coming from Manila. Think of these in hospitals; by every ship coming from Manila. Think of these in hospitals; by every snip coming from Manna. Infink of these things. Would not such a bill as this, when enacted into law, add to these burdens and give little relief to the people you seek to benefit? Might it not, in one view of this case, actually result in injury? I leave this point with my philosophical young friends temporarily swept from their moorings.

Who asks this legislation? A few enthusiastic and noble young this side and one are soldier. Who on the other wave the men on this side and one ex-soldier. Who on the other, save the one soldier, moved naturally by his recollections of having exchanged coffee for tobacco with his neighbor Johnny Reb, whom likely he had been under the painful necessity of killing the next day, before the poor fellow had drunk the coffee!

day, before the poor fellow had drunk the coffee!

This proposition can never receive the approval of a committee of the House, because the members of the majority would hear the mutterings of a storm in the North and West.

If any measure of relief is to come to the ex-Confederate soldier, it should come from the majority side of the Chamber. But permit me to illustrate the position of that side by a little anecdote, which I tell to keep my colleague from Virginia [Mr. OTEY] company.

In my neighborhood there is a bright little boy who was asked by a gentleman not long ago if his mother had $20, and his father, in the kindness of his heart, were to give her $20 more, what would she then have. The boy figured a little while, and looking up said, "Why, sir, she would have a fit; that is what she would have." [Laughter.]

Now, if this proposition had come from that side of the Chamber, or even from some members on this side, I believe that some-ber, or even from some members on this side, I believe that some-body next fall would have a fit. [Laughter.]

What does the Confederate soldier say? Did I not ask my colleague from the Eighth district [Mr. Rixey] yesterday if he had consulted the members of the Confederate camps in his district? What reply did he make? "That some extreme men (if I quote him correctly) are opposed to it," leaving the inference that a few of the high-toned members of the community were opposed to this legislation. Now, last night the report of this discussion went down to Richmond, and there came over the wires this morning a number of telegrams to their Representative. I will read one or two. read one or two.

RICHMOND, VA., January 14, 1902.

Hon. JOHN LAMB, Washington, D. C .:

We are opposed to any law being enacted providing for the admission of Confederate veterans into Federal Soldiers' Homes.

mes.
J. TAYLOR STRATTON,
P. P. WINSTON.
W. P. SMITH.
SAML. H. PULLIAM.
GEO. W. LIBBY.
EDW. GRAY.

J. Taylor Stratton is the adjutant of R. E. Lee Camp, P. P. Winston is the commander of George E. Pickett Camp, of Richmond, W. P. Smith is a Presbyterian minister, who was at the side of Stonewall Jackson and helped to bear him from the field when he fell from the misdirected fire of his own men. Every one of these men are useful and highly respected citizens of the city of Richmond.

Here is another:

RICHMOND, VA., January 14, 1902.

Hon. JOHN LAMB, M. C .: Have talked with Richardson, Wise, Crutchfield, and Lightfoot, and they all oppose Rixey bill. GEORGE L. CHRISTIAN.

You see from these telegrams what some of the leading ex-Confederates of the city of Richmond think of this measure. If you knew these men personally, as I do, and something of their history, knew these men personally, as I do, and something of their history, trials, struggles, and triumphs over misfortune, loss, and suffering, your faith in your fellow-men would be strengthened and your hope for the future of our country grow brighter.

The gentleman who signed this telegram left one leg in the dense forests of the Wilderness, and though a constant sufferer he has won his way to distinction in the profession of the law; has been judge of one of the courts, and is a leading lawyer of the city. One of these mentioned is well known to the older members here—the Hon. George D. Wise—who served five terms in Congress with signal ability. But it has been suggested here to-day that such representative men as these, who can never need a Soldiers' Home, do not know how to feel for that class who are very poor and unfortunate. I contend that nine-tenths of the poor will be as much opposed to this measure as are these gentlemen who send their protests by wire. A word for the poor white men of the South, Mr. Chairman, and I will close these remarks. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] said a while ago that one result of the war was that it freed these men. They were already free, and many enjoyed more liberty then than they have since the war. They are more free to-day than under the reconstruction laws. They will enjoy a larger liberty when the hurtful and unfortunate fifteenth amendment is modified or repealed by competent authority.

It can not be said here or elsewhere too often that the war was by competent authority.

It can not be said here or elsewhere too often that the war was

It can not be said here or elsewhere too often that the war was begun with no intention of freeing the negro—slavery was an incident of the war, by no means the cause of it, if you can believe the proclamation of the President of the United States.

Largely over one-half of the Southern men owned no slaves. Were they fighting to perpetuate slavery? Virginia came within one vote of freeing hers in 1831. No public man in that State, as I read, defended slavery in the abstract up to 1835. My friend from Missouri [Mr. De Armond] said a while ago that the Southern leaders believed they had a right to secede, but that he would not discuss or defend it. I see no good in defending it in this presence, but the philosophical historian of the future will discuss it and will reach about the same conclusion that Massachusetts reached will reach about the same conclusion that Massachusetts reached about the time of the Hartford Convention, and that the people

Yet history will show that the Virginians were slow to avail themselves of this right, and would have refused to do it but for the fact that 75,000 men were ordered out to invade her sister

In the unfortunate struggle I served with a company of 100 men. Forty-three of these never owned, nor did their fathers before them own, a slave, Yet these men were among the bravest soldiers in their regiment.

These, and men like them, voted for the act of secession that carried their State out of the Union. They belonged then as now to that great body of the Anglo-Saxon race who, ever since they met the returning Crusaders in England with the demand that the hut of the humble should be as sacred as the castle of the great, have been the pride and glory of the English-speaking people.

The great majority of these men are as self-reliant and independent as they were in 1861 to 1865. A few possibly might be willing to be the beneficiaries of any scheme wherever it comes from, whether from the Federal or State Government from, whether from the Federal or State Government.

This small number, however, can not be counted in dealing with this question. The Confederate soldiers in many of the counties of Virginia, with their sons and wives—particularly the latter—own the counties. I assisted in organizing a Confederate camp in one of the largest counties of Virginia some time ago. To my surprise, the judge of the court, the sheriff, and treasurer, the supervisors, and nearly every county officer were men who had served through the war. Some had lost limbs, and with scarcely any exception they had received wounds in battle. A glance at the land and property books showed these people to be the scarcely any exception they had received wounds in battle. A glance at the land and property books showed these people to be the owners, comparatively, of the county. They shape its policies, control its public sentiment, and maintain its schools and churches. They are living brave lives and will die worthy patriots. Having made themselves famous to all the ages, they will in a few short years be walking the golden streets you have just heard so beautifully described by the silver-tongued orator from Missouri. The picture so imperfectly drawn of this one county will apply

The picture, so imperfectly drawn, of this one county will apply to all Virginia. Bear patiently with me while I speak a word in behalf of that suffering State. Have you ever stopped to think that she has been the theater of two wars; that she had just recovered from the sweeping losses of the first when a second, against which she pleaded and protested to the last, was laid at her feet? She was then swept with the besom of destruction from her occar layed shows to her mountain tone. Her heartiful yell. her ocean-laved shores to her mountain tops. Her beautiful valley—the garden spot of the world—was made so desolate that "a crow, in passing over, had to carry its rations." The very soldiers I have described, with thousands of their comrades, returned from the fated field of Appomattox to find their counties laid waste the fated field of Appomattox to find their counties laid waste and only the chimneys, in many places, standing to mark the spot where stood their parental homes. With a spirit and resolution in peace that was not surpassed by their splendid achievements in war, these men built up their waste places and rallied from that almost hopeless condition. Through the efforts of such men, aided by the sons who have sprung from their loins, the State of Virginia has for years maintained a Home for her helpless soldiers. She appropriates $170,000 a year for the Home and pensions, and her legislature now in session proposes to increase this to $300,000. [Loud applause.]

If Virginia, so handicapped, can provide for her own, what may we expect of the cotton States, bristling with manufactories and flowing with newly discovered oil!

Not alone on account of pride or for lack of an appreciative sentiment would these people reject such a suggestion as the one now under consideration, but they believe with all their hearts in the well-established principle that the Federal Government should do nothing for the States that the States can do for themselves and that the State should do nothing for the individual that the indi-

Now, thanking my colleagues for the attention they have given me—chiefly because I have voiced the sentiments of a large majority on both sides of the Chamber—and making my profound acknowledgment to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Rixey] for his volunteer labor of love, stronger even than his faith in and hope for his measure, and to his splendid coadjutor from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] for the intellectual treat we have all enjoyed, I close my remarks consoled with the reflection that I have outlined the views of the Confederate soldiers and their families not only in Virginia, but in the Carolinas, in Mississippi, Florida, and Alabama, as well as Tennessee, Arkansas, Kentucky, and the Lone Star State, not forgetting by any means the grand Commonwealth of Missouri, whose noble sons and fair women, the joint offspring of Northern endurance and Southern valor, the joint offspring of Northern endurance and Southern valor, will applaud the independence and manly spirit of one of their favorite sons, however they may regard his judgment and his logic. All these Southern soldiers ask, Mr. Chairman, is to be left to their respective Commonwealths. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, did I understand by the motion of the contlement from Wisconsin rule introduced to held their of the gentleman from Wisconsin who introduced the bill that general debate terminates in ten minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate closes at 4.30.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I can not say what I wanted to say in that time because it now lacks but ten minutes to the expiration of general debate. But I want to say one word, not so much to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] as with reference to the question which has been suggested by my honorable friend from Missouri, as to what were the purposes and objects of the men who went into the Confederate army. I want to see the truth of history vindicated. I do not wish it to go down to posterity that the object of the men who withdrew from the House and Senate when the Confederate government was established to raise the armies for the maintenance of the independence of the South were animated by a desire to destroy the funda-mental principle which lies at the very basis of the Constitution of the United States. They believed that the rights and interests of the people of the South were jeopardized by Mr. Lincoln and the party that elected him, and they believed that the Govern-the party that elected him, and they believed that the Government was originally founded by the assent of the States.

They referred to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that when the Government of the United States, at the expiration of the Revolutionary war, was inaugurated by the original thirteen States, that it was a government predicated upon the great principle of State rights and community independence. It was for this that they made the declaration. It was for that that they fought the four years' war of the Confederacy. Am I right or wrong when I say that history defends our action? The original thirteen States framed the government which was to become the government over the States which ratified it, if 9 States ratified it; and then by the very declaration of the Constitution itself it was to become a government only over the States so ratifying the same. Five States of the original thirteen, including North Carolina and 3 others, for a long time refused to accede to the Government of the United States. They finally did so, and it became the government over 13 States, and the language of the Constitution was that it was to be a government "only over the States so ratifying the same."

fying the same."

The people of the South believed that their rights were jeopardized. They appealed to the great principles which laid at the foundation of the Constitution of 1789, which was the principle of home rule and a community independence. When we had this war it was not for the destruction of that great cardinal principle, but for its preservation. And when the war closed and the Government had to be again reorganized, and these Southern States again to be brought into the Union, how was it done, Mr. Chairman? Not by force of the Government, not by the bayonet and sword, but it was done by the consent of the people in convention They therefore did not make war upon the principles assembled. which lay at the foundation of the Federal Constitution, but they made the war to maintain those principles, to defend and not destroy them.

I want the truth of history to be written, not in the spirit of laudation of one side and abuse of the other, but I want it to be written in the light of history, which will show how the government was originally framed and what was the purpose and object of the men who served in the Confederate army. It was an army organized to preserve the great and vital principles of the Constitution. It was a government founded on those principles, and when the Confederate constitution came to be adorted in Monte. when the Confederate constitution came to be adopted in Montwhen the Confederate constitution came to be adopted in Montgomery, and the government finally established at Richmond, they adopted the very same principles, only they specified with more particularity some of the grounds on which that constitution was adopted. And when the war closed and this rehabilitation had to occur, it was decided by the court of highest resort—by that tribunal to whose decision we bow—that this was originally a government founded upon the consent of the States; that it was a government of free and independent States, based upon the action of the States, and that it was not a government of force and power. And hence it was that every State in the Union that was in the Federal Government furnished its soldiers under that principle of the Constitution mentioned in the decision of the Supreme Court that this was "an indissoluble Union, based on free and independent and indestructible States."

If the States had to yield to the superior force, it did not render less secred the great principles for which they were struggling.

less sacred the great principles for which they were struggling. It was as old as the history of the English-speaking people and extended back to the time when our ancestors made the declaration of rights and passed the Bill of Rights, and in our own country to the time when our ancestors assembled in Philadelphia and declared that it was a construction of the interest of the int clared that it was a government for the protection of the interests of the people of the States; that the colonies were and of right ought to be free and independent States. It was to maintain that great principle that the government of the Confederacy was formed, and her soldiers fought for it, not for the destruction of the great principles of the Constitution, because they had to be reverted to when we came to reorganize our Government after

At first it was attempted to do this by sending military satraps to the Southern States to be governors over us with an armed force. That was a failure. The reconstruction laws were a failforce. That was a failure. The reconstruction laws were a failure. It was found that there was no way of reorganizing this Government and bringing back the Confederate States under the Government except by the consent of those States as expressed in their conventions. And thus we stand to-day—reunited, because we were struggling for the great principles of home rule and community independence, and not to destroy the cardinal and essential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original Consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original consential principles which lie at the very basis of the original consential principles which li stitution of 1789, which is now the Constitution of the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Our forefathers, in their solemn Declaration of Independence, which severed the ties that bound them to the mother country, declared, "That these colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States."

They waged the seven years' war of the Revolution to maintain this declaration. They succeeded.

When they came to form a civil government to protect the liberties thus dearly achieved they refused to give the Federal Government created under the articles of confederation the power of taxation.

The war of the Revolution had been waged by them to free the colonies from "unjust, onerous, and oppressive taxation without representation."

It was doubtless this recollection, fresh in their minds, which prompted them to deny the power of taxation to the newly con-

A very few years sufficed to show that a General or Federal Government dependent on the voluntary quota of taxes to be furnished by each State, and without the power of taxation, could not be self-sustaining.

A commission was appointed, at the head of which stood Alexander Hamilton, to meet at Annapolis, Md., to amend the articles of confederation. Finding amendment impracticable, they recommended to the Continental Congress to call a convention of all the original 13 States.

The Continental Congress passed an act authorizing a convention of all the original 13 States to assemble at Philadelphia in 1787 to adopt a new Constitution. The convention, presided over by General Washington, adopted the new Constitution, known as the Constitution of 1789, and in accordance with its convention of the several States for their adopted. own provisions submitted it to the several States for their adoption or rejection.

Let it at once be noted that by the very terms of this Constitu-tion it was to become a Constitution over the States only "when 9 of the original 13 States should in convention assembled adopt the same," thus placing it in the power of 5 of the smallest of the original 13 States, with an insignificant and sparse population, to have defeated its adoption.

It is also important to observe that this Constitution of 1789 further provided that when adopted "by 9 of the original 13 States" it should only be operative and binding on the States so ratifying the same.

Each State ratified the Constitution for itself by itself, and was bound only by its own ratification.

So when the rights and liberties of the Southern States were invaded by unlawful conspiracies and combinations to destroy their property and disturb their domestic tranquillity, what was more natural than that they should declare, as they acceded to the Union of their own right and free will to secure liberty and the peaceable possession of their property, when this was denied them, they had the right of secession?

When the war closed we surrendered by capitulation with arms in our hands. What were the terms of the capitulation with Grant at Appomattox and Sherman in North Carolina? They were:

That the Confederates should furl their flags, stack their arms, return to their homes, and yield obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the Union then and there existing; and it was stipulated on the other side that they should have the protection of the Constitution and laws of the Union and should not be molested because of their participation in the Confederate war.

That the Confederates kept the terms of their capitulation no one will be heard to deny.

When an effort was made to include Gen. Robert E. Lee in the indictment with Mr. Davis, the great Union general, U.S. Grant, with a magnanimity which characterized the terms given by him at Appomattox, said, "No, this can not be; this would be to disat Appomattox, said, "No, this can not be; this would be to dishonor the parole granted by me to Lee and his men when they surrendered, with arms in their hands, and on written terms of capitulation." And thus Jefferson Davis was left alone to bear our sins, and right royally did he bear the burden and wear the manacles of a prisoner. The question soon arose as to how the seceded States were to be brought back into the Union.

It was at first attempted to effect this by force, and on this plan military commanders were assigned to duty as governors of the second States.

This proved a failure. It was then attempted to rehabilitate the seceded States by unjust and oppressive reconstruction laws.

This, too, proved a failure. The United States Government had at last to recognize the great principle of home rule and community independence, which is the corner stone of the Constitution of 1789, and allow the States, in their own conventions, to resume their places in the Union.

Let it be remembered that under our Constitution, the Constitution of 1789, Delaware, the smallest State in the Union, with her 67,000 people and her one Representative in this House, as one of the original thirteen States, and with one Representative still, stands on a perfect equality in the Senate with New York, with her 6,000,000, and upon a proposition to destroy the equality of the States in the Senate can put her veto on all the other States and all the people of all the other States, and that she can not be deprived of this power but by her own consent.

The sovereign power and entity of the States had not been destroyed by the secession of the States, nor had it been destroyed by the four years' war between the States.

The Supreme Court of the United States that angust tribunal

The Supreme Court of the United States, that august tribunal to whose ultimate decision all good citizens bow, declared in the celebrated case of ex parte Garland that this was "An indissoluble Union, composed of indestructible States."

And so the termination of the war between the States found all the Southern States with indestructible sovereignties still theirs, and yielding a willing obedience to the laws of the Union.

The Southern States believed they had the right to retire from the Union; they never sought or desired to destroy that Union.

When the seceding States had adopted a constitution—a complete counterpart of the Constitution of 1789—their first act was, as early as February 4, before the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, to appoint a commission "Fer the purpose of negotiating friendly relations between that Government and the Confederate States of America, and for the settlement of all questions of disagreement between the two Governments upon the principles of right, justice, equity, and good faith." Two of these commissioners were Martin Crawford, of Georgia, and John Forsythe, of Alabama. The then Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, refused to hear the proposition of the commissioners of the Confederate States, and the war

It has been asserted by some that this war was waged by the Confederate forces to perpetuate slavery, and by the Union forces to free the slaves. I deny the truth of this statement.

The abolition of slavery was an incident of the war, and a very striking one, but not the cause of it.

The differences, which were developed in the very convention which framed the Constitution of 1789, and in the convention of each one of the original thirteen States that met to ratify or reject this Constitution was as to whether the Convention to restate the convention of the convention ject this Constitution, were as to whether the Government created by this Constitution was a national and central Government, or how far it was federative in its character. This was the germ from which the conflict came.

I listened with great pleasure to the very broad, philanthropic, and patriotic speech of the honorable gentleman from Virginia on his bill to admit the Confederate soldiers to the Soldiers' Homes built by the Government to give homes and shelter and maintenance to the Union soldiers, and thought to myself that he drew his thought and inspiration from the sentiments uttered at Atlanta, Ga., by our late noble President, William McKinley, whose untimely death shrouded the whole people in mourning, when he proposed that the graves of the dead Confederate soldiers should receive the same care and attention as those of the Union soldiers.

Had this proposition come with absolute unanimity from our brothers on the other side of this Chamber I might have been brothers on the other side of this Chamber I might have been willing to have agreed with the proposition so forcibly presented by the gentleman from Virginia. But the Confederate soldier, still surviving though poor, has lost none of his pride and self-esteem. He risked all and lost all in the great conflict between the States save his honor. This is dearer to him than the laurel wreath that crowns the victor's brow. He can not accept anything in the shape of charity, except it be the offering of those who shared his perils and triumphs and defeat in the great conflict. The CHAIRMAN. The time limited for general debate has expired

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] desire further time?

Mr. HOOKER. No; I will continue my remarks under the five-minute rule or ask consent to extend them in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

will stand approved.

ELLA A. HALL VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Ella A. Hall vs. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of sundry steamship companies, insurance companies, railroad companies, and the reprepanies, insurance companies, ramout companies, and the repre-sentatives of other important companies interested in shipping, praying for the enactment of legislation to construct permanent and substantial light-houses, in place of light-ships, at Pollock Rip Shoals and other dangerous places, of which Cape Hatteras is, I believe, one.

These petitioners feel that the Government ought to accept the preposal of a builder of high character and great intelligence, who maintains that he can construct light-houses in places where it has been supposed by engineers that it was impracticable, and he is willing to take all the risk of failure of such an attempt or loss, and to make no claim for compensation until his structure is completed.

I think that offer ought to be considered very respectfully, unsess we propose to exclude from the resources of the American less we propose to exclude from the resources of the American people, both in naval and military inventions, and in matters like this, of safety off the coasts of vessels, the marvelous resources of American invention and to leave such things wholly to the capacity of our existing public servants, engineers or others, whoever they may happen to be.

I ask that the petition, which is brief and clear, may be printed as a degree of the companion o as a document, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it will be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, who were instructed by resolution of the Senate of March 8, 1901, to consider the subject and report to the Senate plans for the development and improvement of the entire park system of the District of Columbia, submitted a preliminary report; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I introduce several bills relating to the organization of what is known as the Naval Reserve. have heretofore introduced other bills proposing to make provision of different kinds for this organization, without in any way being committed to favor any of the propositions.

I wish to say that I do not think the expectations of the sanguine people who count upon a naval reserve will ever be realized. The experience which we had with the Naval Militia tends to show this. At the time of the war, when the interest was great, plenty of bright young men were found willing to enter this voluntary association, but as time passed and the war ended, and the war note died away, the interest ceased.

Mr. HAWLEY. The late war?

Mr. HALE James also a late of the war and the war ended, and the war note died away, the interest ceased.

Mr. HAWLEY. The late war?

Mr. HALE. I am speaking about the late war. It has been found difficult, Mr. President, to get young men to continue and keep up the Naval Militia. All my investigation of the subject tends to show me that we are not likely as a nation ever to take much interest in or to have any great and efficient militia either in the land service or in the sea service. We shall have to depend in any emergency upon either volunteering when the time comes, in which the American people will never fail, for land or sea service, or upon some form of compulsory military service.

If we are to become a great war power, with a large army and

If we are to become a great war power, with a large army and a great navy, we shall have to accommodate ourselves to conditions and learn the lesson that other great powers have learned. All the great European powers that stand frowning and snarling at each other depend upon some form of compulsory military service of the people itself, and the countries become a military camp. England has learned this lesson from her last, her smallest, and her wickedest war, and is to-day on the point of resorting to conscription in order to keep up her dwindling forces that are engaged in subjecting freemen thousands of miles away. She can not depend upon volunteering. If we have settled that we are to be a great war power, with a great army and a great navy, and enter the lists of the warlike and the predatory nations, no and enter the lists of the warlike and the predatory nations, no system of volunteering will answer the purpose.

I have no doubt the Naval Committee (perhaps I shall do so under the instruction of that committee) will report some measure for a naval reserve, but it will not be a success, Mr. President. The Naval Militia has not been a success. As I have said, when the war note dies away men in the United States turn their attention to other things; the young men will not enlist in these volunteer organizations; the interest will die out, and we must depend upon other things.

I ask that these bills may be read twice by title and referred to Î ask that these bills may be read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. Before the bills are read, I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if he would dispense entirely with the militia—with what we call the National Guard?

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose we shall dispense with it. It will keep on in a lingering, half-hearted, and incomplete way.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I deny that it will be lingering and half-hearted. We have a very excellent National Guard organization in our State ready to be ordered, under the Constitution, by the President to any duty whatever, whether on account of mob or revolution, and it is a valuable protection of the country. of mobor revolution, and it is a valuable protection of the country.

Mr. HALE. It is somewhat, but it is very meager. It does not serve any great purpose in case of an emergency and in war. It will be kept up for these purposes—Connecticut will keep it up—but it will be small. We keep it up in Maine, but it is very small. In time of war it will not be worth reckoning. I only wish to warn Senators and those gentlemen in the country who are enthusiastic in the belief that we can have a large militia, either upon land or in the naval service, in which the people will take much interest, that they are likely to be mistaken. The Senator from Connecticut denies that this is so. It is only a matter of conjecture with him and with me. He believes more in the Land Connecticut denies that the Land Connecticut denies that the land with me. in it than I do. Time alone will tell.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if we did not improvise an army in the late war, and if its

Maine if we did not improvise an army in the late war, and if its magnitude and the facility with which it was raised were not really surprising. Was not that to a great extent owing to the State organizations then existing?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it was very little owing to the State organizations. I have said that in a time of emergency the American people will never fail to volunteer by thousands and hundreds of thousands, and millions if necessary, and will speedily make a good army. speedily make a good army.

Mr. STEWART. Does not the training the men receive in those organizations enable them to get together speedily, and does not that have a marked effect?

Mr. HALE. Not in an appreciable figure.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will permit me, he is certainly mistaken. We have in the State of Wisconsin a splendid National Guard, a number of regiments. There is a fine esprit de corps existing among those troops, and they responded promptly at the call of the Government in the

Mr. HALE. We did the same thing in Maine, but it was small.
Mr. SPOONER. It was small, but we had regiments still left which were not permitted to enter the service.
Mr. HALE. How many regiments does Wisconsin keep up year after year and maintain?

Mr. SPOONER. Five, I think.

Mr. HALE. Five regiments?
Mr. HAWLEY. There are four in Connecticut, ready to be called out at a minute's notice on the tap of the drum.
Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?
Mr. HALE. I am very glad to yield. I want to have the matter were letted.

ter ventilated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This discussion is hardly in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. Let it go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. Yes, I yield to the Senators, one after the other, who desire to interrupt me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsyl-

Mr. QUAY. I merely wish to remark, what I have no doubt the Senator from Maine recollects, that in the recent unpleasant-ness with Spain Pennsylvania delivered a National Guard of 15,000 bayonets in two weeks' notice to the Government. That is not small.

Mr. HALE. Well, it is not.

Mr. HALE. Wen, it is not.

Mr. QUAY. That was a pretty good contribution. And those troops were as good as any in the Regular Army, and were so reported by the United States inspecting officer who visited them.

Mr. HALE. That was a large number. Pennsylvania is a great

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Maine will carry his memory back to the inauguration—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. I yield to anyone.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course he yields to me. I always yield to him. If the Senator will carry his memory back to the inauguration ceremonies here, which occur every four years, he will know that Pennsylvania avenue is filled with splendid troops, and they are nearly all troops of the States

Mr. HALE. But the loss of life on Pennsylvania avenue in those cases is very small.

nose cases is very small. [Laughter.]
Mr. SPOONER. They did not come here to fight; but they are capable of fighting. I merely called the attention of the Senator to that fact to show what interest there is in the States in maintaining these organizations and how complete and splendid they are. When the Senator says that it is weak and there is very little sentiment behind it, I think he is mistaken. It has been constantly increasing, and it ought to be helped by the United States Government.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the other element as important as some Senators do; but what I referred to especially as being weak and meager was the Naval Militia, which is the subject of the bills which I introduce.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a different matter.

Mr. HALE. We have found great difficulty in getting men to

Mr. MASON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HALE. Certainly. Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Maine and to the Senate that although the State of Illinois has no seacoast, except Lake Michigan, we furnished to the Naval Militia in the late war with Spain our share of the Naval Militia. We furnished one-fifth of all that were taken in by the United States

Navy.

I have talked with the officers who had command of the men from Illinois; I have talked with the Secretary of the Navy; I have talked with admirals, and I wish to say to the Senator that every man from Illinois came back with an honorable discharge. We furnished more than our share, as I said, one-fifth of the total number enlisted as the Naval Militia, and those men came from the very best families in the State of Illinois; and not one of them ever received a reprimand during his term of service. It is not a weak arm of the service. It was exceedingly important at the time that they enlisted. While I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the matter now before the Senate, I wish the Senator to know that the Naval Militia, and especially as it came from the State of Illinois, was not a weak but a strong arm in the assistance of the Navy of this country in the late war with Spain.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, the Senator is making my speech and making it better than I can. I do not need to talk with secretaries and admirals to know that the men who went from Illinois into the naval service during the war were good men and rendered great service. My point is not that in time of war we will not have plenty of men. We will have them. All the men who went in from Illinois rendered good service, as did those from the other States. But I venture again to say that it will be found after the time has passed away, when the war is over and the excitement has gone, there is no longer the impetus which bears young men into the service, and this interest, just as it has been with the Naval Militia, wanes and ceases. It is difficult to find men now to man the vessels which the Navy Department is ready to turn over to the Naval Militia.

Let the bills be read by title and referred. Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, I think very naturally it is very easy to get into the Navy, but it is awfully hard to get out of it. No matter what the exigency in a particular case may be at home, I have always found it impossible to get a man out of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. It is pretty hard to get a man out of the Army

Mr. SPOONER. No; I think more discretion is exercised in reference to the discharge of a man from the Army.

Mr. HALE. I have a great many applications from men in the Philippines who want to get home, and they can not get away.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in defense of Colorado. Colorado sent a regiment of the National Guard to the Philippine Islands, and I can produce at least two officers of the Regular Army who will state that when that regiment marched out of Denver there was no regular regiment in the United States that was better drilled and better equipped than they were. It was commanded by a regular West Point officer, who graduated at West Point, taking the highest rank that ever was taken there. He was subsequently made a brigadier-general. All the subordinate officers had been officers of the National Guard, and all of them were well drilled and equipped. One of them is a colonel now in the service in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator understands and the Senate understands that I do not in any way reflect upon the militia as it exists. They were brave men, competent men, and had good officers. My only point is that it will not be, in any great war we may ever have, a very large feature.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think that the maintenance of a reasonable National Guard promotes that spirit which brings the young men into the Army when the time comes.

I wish to state an incident of the war, though I can not give the date. I think I made the statement here at the last session, but the particular dates have passed out of my mind. The Government of the United States wanted a fighting force. They wanted also a force to guard some stations and places, as they said. They called upon the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois particularly for recruits, saying distinctly that these men need not go into the field and take part in the contest at first. The governors of those States said they would secure for the Government 120,000 men. The authorities here expressed some doubt whether they could do it and inquired how long it would take. They replied, "In three weeks." In two weeks the State of Ohio put thirty-odd thousand men into the field, and those men did not go to guard stations. They put them in the forefront of the American Army, and they were but the civilians of this great country of ours.

It has ever been the boast of a republic that the fighting force was composed of the citizens and not the regular army, and they ever will be the fighting force. They ever have been in the history of the world. From the earliest days the men who fought the greatest battles have not been men who were paid by the month to serve the government; they have been the men from the ranks of business life. They are the common people of the country. Whether it was in the old armies of the Greeks or whether it was in the great French contest, when Napoleon fought the world, battles were fought by civilians and not by regulars. So it was in our war of the Revolution. We made regulars of them after a while, it is true, but they were civilian soldiers. And so it was in the great civil war. Everybody knows that the regulars composed but a mere paucity, a mere nothing, compared with the great body of civilian soldiers.

I challenge, Mr. President, any historian or any reader of history to show anywhere in the world such battles as were fought.

to challenge, Mr. President, any historian or any reader of history to show anywhere in the world such battles as were fought between the South and the North, and, if you go back to the French army, the Old Guard was but the militia of France. Out of it grew, of course, a trained corps that was called the Old Guard, but they were the militia, called from the common people and not from the paid soldiers of that day.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator from Maine had confined himself to his opinion about the naval reserves he would have done better, if I may suggest that he ever has done anything that could be done better.

Mr. HALE. Quite likely.

Mr. HOAR. But I suppose the question of a naval reserve, as it has been so far tested by experience, is yet unsettled and is in an experimental stage in the opinion of the Senate and of the country. It has its own peculiar consideration. But I do not believe there is anything which is more thoroughly vindicated by the experience of this country than the fact that the preparation the experience of this country than the fact that the preparation which every nation ought to have for sudden warlike emergencies, which inevitably every nation will be called on to meet, ought to consist in large measure of a trained militia. It must be done either by a trained militia or a regular army, or by both.

The judgment of the American people is, I think, well supported by experience. It is that we ought to have an ample orported by experience. It is that we ought to have an ample organization or skeleton of trained officers ready in time of peace for every emergency of war, and a moderate Regular Army of soldiers by profession, and that that should be supplemented by a large number in every State of the youth of military age (and if every youth of military age belong to it, so much the better, being of sound physical and mental capacity), who shall have such discipline as a militia organization, as a suitable military camp, and occasionally during the year, an assembly in a large camp, and occasionally during the year an assembly in a large body, training somewhat for such military exigencies as may arise, will furnish.

Now, it is not necessary for me to say anything of the contribution of the State of Massachusetts to any single war we have ever had. Her history does not require any son of hers to blow her trumpet. She has been criticised for want of zeal in the war her trumpet. She has been criticised for want of zeal in the war of 1812. She did far more in the way of soldiers and sailors than her proportion as compared with any of her critics. One single town in Massachusetts had nearly a thousand prisoners in Dartmoor prison when the war ended. Massachusetts had more men in the Revolutionary war than all the States south of Mason and Dixon's line together had soldiers on land, and she had more soldiers on land than all those States put together. And yet those States are entitled to as much credit, and possibly some of them to more credit than we can claim for ourselves, because they were the theater of war, while she was not and the theater of war, while she was not, and—

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me a moment? I should like to understand if I correctly heard the Senator. Do I understand the Senator to say that the State of Massachusetts during the Revolutionary war had more soldiers on land than all the States south of Mason and Dixon's line?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. BACON. Put together.

More than all those States had?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; put together, in the Revolutionary war. That is what I understand.

Mr. BACON. I am not prepared now, and will not interrupt the Senator, but I shall endeavor to show in the future whether that was the case

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to correct him. Mr. LODGE. I will state to the Senator that it was t Mr. LODGE. I will state to the Senator that it was the subject of an official record of the Secretary of War in connection with the assumption of the State debt, and he will find it in an early volume of American State Papers in the State Department.

Mr. BACON. I am much obliged to the Senator, and will I shall probably find some information on adopt the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. I am s I am sorry the Senator from Georgia interrupted me where he did, because I was in the midst of a sentence following that statement when the Senator rose. I had already said, although the sentence was incomplete when he interrupted it, that I did not claim that Massachusetts was entitled to more credit than they, because with their great spaces and sparse population they also labored under the additional disadvantage of being the theater of war, while, after Sir William Howe was driven out of Boston by an army in command of a Virginian and with Virginian troops under his command besieging and helping Boston, we were not the theater of war. We were even then comparatively a compactly settled and wealthy State. But I stated the Before the Senator rose to interrupt me I was saying this, he will do me the justice to remember, because it became a part of the matter under discussion.

Mr. President, in talking about the training in civil life of sailors, there is another fact which has not been generally known, even here. Our independence in the Revolutionary war was won at sea. Lord North and the monarch, George III, and their successors, could have continued for a hundred years, if it had been necessary, the land war of the Revolution, and England was rich enough to pay the cost then. The English people would have submitted. What compelled Lord North and the unwilling monarch to make peace was the rate of insurance on English commerce. It was not the French alliance. It was not the French troops under Rochambeau. It was the New England sailors and the other sailors of the maritime States who won our independence. There is a letter among the papers of my own family, written by my grandfather, then a member of the Continental Congress, from Philadelphia to the governor of the State of Connecticut, before the French alliance, in which he says that the insurance in the Mediterranean on English commercial ships was insurance in the Mediterranean on English commercial ships was before the French alliance, in which he says that the rate of then 28 per cent. That is what won our independence. It was the merchants of Bristol, the shipowners of Bristol, and it was won not by a navy, but by privateers and other sailors who had been trained at sea

Now, when the late war broke out I do not know, except from what other Senators have stated, how it was in other States, but I know that the quota of Massachusetts for the war with Spain came in substance from the regular militia organizations, soldiers with the military spirit and with a great deal of military training. In some instances they went into the war as regiments with the name of the State, and I suppose that was true in other States. But at any rate, whether they retained their regimental name or not, the companies in the towns and in the various neighborhoods gathered, and they were ready. If anything went wrong in that war (as little went wrong when the fighting came) it was not owing to the lack of discipline of the militiamen who fought it; it was owing to the lack of discipline of the limitation who longit it; it was owing to the lack of proper mechanism supplied from above by the Government of the United States.

While I do not rise to controvert what the Senator from Maine has said about the Naval Reserve, because I do not know enough to discuss that question now, I do most emphatically controvert, in the light of all the lack of the l in the light of all our history from the beginning, what he has said about the State volunteer militia.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in vindication of the National Guard, and to do it by illustrating the conduct and experience of Connecticut. In every Congressional district we have an excellent regiment. It has its hall—its armory. It drills by regiment, by battalion, and company drills at regular intervals. The State has provided a splendid camp upon the seashore, with all the necessary appliances, where the brigade of the State, the four regiments, meet every year and spend a week, being exercised in military drills and maneuvers. I know each one of those companies in my own town and elsewhere. They are ready to be called out at a moment's notice. They are well drilled in company and battalion drill and they would be an exceedingly valuable aid in case of rebellion, insurrection, or actual war. They are well-drilled men and will turn out now, marching as well as the average of the Regular Army.
Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire, even if I had the information now at hand, to take issue with the distinguished and honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] so far as to enter into any discussion of his remarkable statement that the Revolutionary war was won by the rates of insurance, and not by the valor and prowess and sacrifices of our soldiers on the land. I say I would not undertake at this time to enter into such a disrespiration to tundertake at this time to enter into such a discussion, because it would involve a very broad field of debate; but I am unwilling, for one, that such a statement should be made in the Senate of the United States, and that by the silence of all of us it should seem to be acquiesced in. I have no such belief, Mr. President. I do not think that our liberties were won by rates of insurance. I think they were won by the valor, the prowess, the sacrifice, the endurance, and the fortitude of American soldiers; that they were paid for by the blood that they shed, and that they were not due to the mere mercenary consideration of what were the rates of insurance.

I do not propose to go into that discussion, nor do I propose to follow the various Senators in the discussion as to which State has furnished the best or the most promptly soldiers in any war; but, as it is in order, I will state this: If the public prints are correct in their statements—I have not verified them myself—the records of the Adjutant-General's Office will show that in the recent Spanish war, in proportion to population, the State of Georgia furnished more soldiers than any other State in the Union.

Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to make a statement to my honorable friend from Georgia. He says, if I understand him, that he thought I said that the war of the Revolution was won by a consideration of the rates of insurance on the part of our soldiers.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no. The Senator misunderstood me. I understood the Senator to say that the British Government granted our independence not because we had won battles on the field, but because the rate of insurance in the Mediterranean had gotten to be so high that their merchants compelled them to make peace.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I said.

Mr. BACON. I say, Mr. President, I can not for a moment by my silence admit that such a statement can be acquiesced in by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, what was it that created those rates of insurance which made the commerce of England—then and now and always, for two centuries and more, the real governing power of England—clamor for peace because the war was costing the British merchants 28 per cent on their cargoes on every short voyage in the Mediterranean? It was the valor of the American sailor which brought that about. It was the terror of our captains and their crews.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. I could tell the Senator, if there were time, a little of the condition of the same feeling during the war of 1812. erning power of England-clamor for peace because the war was tle of the condition of the same feeling during the war of 1812. Among Mr. Canning's papers, lately published, there is a letter from Mr. James, the author of the Naval History of Great Britain—a great authority on this subject—in which he wants something put into the Queen's speech to reassure the British people—that was in 1818—because of some statements that had been made in our President's message; and Mr. James said that everywhere one might go he would find evidences of this feeling and that it would not do for them to get into a difficulty with us.

But, Mr. President, there is no use in replying to the Senator from Georgia, who, in the first place, does not seem to understand what you say, and, in the second place, does not listen when you explain to him. [Laughter.] Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to the pending question? Mr. TILLMAN.

Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Caro-

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, so many of the Senators having been indulged in a few remarks, I think I might catechise the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I should like to ask the Senator whether the British Government was influenced in granting peace and independence to the American colonists in the Revolutionary war by the rates of insurance, or whether it arose from the victories of our troops and of our militia-I am a stickler for the militia and believe in them because I was once a captain in the militia-does the Senator believe that we won our independence by the rates of insurance, or did it come from the victories at Kings Mountain, Cowpens, and Yorktown—specifically, yes or no?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, of course the Senator never heard of Concord or of Lexington.
Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, of course; but those were little skirmishes in the beginning of the struggle, you know. We had about thirty engagements in my State, where more men were engaged and more blood was shed than at Lexington and Concord, but I do not decry or belittle the greatness of Massachusetts. I only want the Senator to give the balance of the thirteen colonies a little share in the glory of having won the independence of this nation. is glory enough to go around, as our great Admiral has said about sglory enough to go around, as our great Admirat has said about Santiago, and I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts to be "hogging" it all. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. I have a slight impression, Mr. President, that the people of Massachusetts drove the invaders out of their capital, and that, on the other hand, Charleston was possibly not in a condition to dictate terms to Great Britain toward the latter part condition to dictate terms to Great Britain toward the latter part of the Revolutionary war. I shall, however, be entirely frank in this matter, and I therefore say that I do not think that it was the fear of our sailors, or the dread of British commerce, or the valor of the soldiers or the sailors in that war that won our independence, but since I have heard the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Tillman] I think it was the dread and the anticipation of the fact that he was going to rise up as a captain of militia in a future age that made Great Britain stop. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. After such a compliment as that I think I

Mr. TILLMAN. After such a compliment as that, I think I must subside. [Laughter.]

Resolved. HEARINGS BY INTEROCEANIC CANALS COMMITTEE.

Mr. TURNER. At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals [Mr. Morgan], I offer the order which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate be authorized to print, from time to time, any hearings had by that committee, or any subcommittee thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the order will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. What is the effect of the statute about requiring resolutions for printing to be referred to the Committee on Printing? If the printing would cost more than $500, the resolution would be unlawful without reference to the Committee on Printing. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was assuming that the printing would not cost more than $500.

Mr. HOAR. It might be a solid document. If the Senator will put in the resolution a provision that the expense of printing will put in the resolution a provision that the expense of printing shall not exceed $500, that will make it right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no limit of $500, the Chair understands, to the request of a committee for the printing of evidence taken before it.

Mr. HALE. I had occasion to look that matter up when I was chairman of the Committee on Printing, and it was then, I think, the decision of the Chair that continuing work or the work of printing at different times does not come under the provisions of what is called the Manderson law, or the $500 limit. That applies what is called the Manderson law, or the $500 limit. That applies to any particular document or any particular work presented to the Senate, but not to hearings before committees.

The PRESIDENT protempore. The Chair so understood. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

PRISONERS OF WAR IN BERMUDA.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read. The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President, if in his judgment it be not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to inform the Senate whether the Department of State has any official information whether the British Government exact duties on goods intended for prisoners of war in Bermuda in violation of Article XVI of the convention at The Hague, which is as follows:

"Gifts and relief in kind for prisoners of war shall be admitted free of all duties of entry and others, as well as of payments for carriage by the Government railways."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MONEY. I did not catch that resolution. I should be ery glad to have it again read.

Mr. HOAR. I will state, if the Senator will pardon me—
Mr. MONEY. Certainly.
Mr. HOAR. Information has reached me from a source of very high authority indeed that some charitable organizations in this country have sent supplies, comforts, etc., to some Boer prisoners in Bermuda, of which there is a large assemblage encamped there, and that the Bermuda authorities exact duties. There is an article in the convention of The Hague that no duties shall be exacted by any Government which is a party to the convention upon articles intended for prisoners of war, and that no charges shall be made on such articles on any Government railway. This resolution asks the President, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate whether the State Department has any official information on that subject

Mr. MONEY. I am obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts. The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

its service and covered by letters patent.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I would remind the Senate that I obtained the floor and yielded only to one or two Senators, and that we are not proceeding with the Calendar under Rule with the Calendar under Rule VIII, but by my consent to defer a matter that is of no special moment to me other than that of due respect to the memory of a late colleague in the other House. If we are going to continue this proceeding we may run on some bills presently that will possibly lead to extended debate. There are many Senators who left the Chamber of the the overesting session under the life. the Chamber after the executive session understanding that we would soon adjourn, and it is probable that some of the measures which have already gone through might have been objected to if they had been present. I do not like to appear to exercise any favoritism or anything of the kind, but let me ask if this bill will be likely to excite any debate, and if so, will the Senator from Louisiana insist upon the passage of the bill?

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That to reimburse the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition Company, at Charleston, S. C., for expenses heretofore incurred or that may be incurred up to June I, 1902, on account of the United States Government exhibit at said exposition, for transportation, sleeping-car fares, subsistence of Government employees, freight, installation, and care, construction of building occupied by the Fish Commission exhibit, and for compensation for floor space occupied by the Government exhibit, and for compensation for floor space occupied by the Government exhibit, and for compensation for floor space occupied by the Government exhibits other than that of the Fish Commission in the exposition building, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90.000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed on vouchers presented by said exposition company and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution to pay the expenses of the United States Government exhibit at the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition in the city of Charleston, country of Charleston, State of South Carolina, during the years 1901 and 1902."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution at the present time? [A pause.] The Chair hears

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I beg to submit very few words in explanation of the substitute resolution which is now before the House.

After the adjournment of the last Congress the President of the United States directed the transportation to Charleston, S. C., of the Government exhibit that is now there. The President has no authority to pay the expenses of the transportation or of the subsistence of the Government officers or employees in charge of that exhibit. Accordingly those have been paid by the managers of the exposition, and this joint resolution is intended to reimburse the management for the actual expenditures made by them on that account.

This is to be the beginning and the end of all governmental expenditures on account of the exposition. The House resolution is by way of a substitute for a Senate resolution, which practically committed the Government to a participation in the exposi-tion, establishing a board of commissioners, providing for the striking of medals, and for all of the other things which commonly are done in connection with such expositions. It was the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations that, the President having ordered the exhibit to be made, the Congress, without questioning his authority or criticising his action in any manner, out of respect to the dignity of the Government, ought not to permit the exposition to pay for the board, transportation, and shelter of the Government employees who have been sent to Charleston to care for the Government exhibit. Accordingly the committee have directed me to report the substitute, and ask its adoption by the House

I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Elliott] if he desires to be heard.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I should like to be heard very briefly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman; but before I do so, if the gentleman will pardon me, I wish to say that the technical jurisdiction over the matter was with the Committee on Appropriations, but the committee considered that the subject was within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, and accordingly the bill was referred to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Tawney], chairman of that committee, for his consideration and action, and perhaps he will speak for himself, for I understand he authorized and approved the bill in its present form.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina

[Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say only a word or two about this matter. The House may rely upon the fact that this appropriation is the most economical that has ever been made for an exposition. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody] lose the Government exhibit, assumed the entire charge of its transportation, installation, and maintenance. The consequence is that we saw, with the utmost care, that all of the expenses were cut down to the lowest possible limit. The House may rely upon it, therefore, that not a dollar is to be wasted, and that every cent that is here appropriated will go to the Government exhibit pure and simple.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Certainly.
Mr. HEMENWAY. I would ask the gentleman if this $90,000 is appropriated whether that will be all the Charleston Exposition will ask in the way of appropriation from the General Government?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Every dollar.
Mr. HEMENWAY. Every dollar?
Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes, every dollar; not a cent more.

And, Mr. Speaker, there is another benefit which I will refer and the country may rest assured that this is the most acceptable Government exhibit ever displayed at an exposition, because there is nothing there except what will be interesting to the people. All else has been eliminated from motives of economy, and the result is that we have an arbibit that contains a superior and the country may be a superior or the people. and the result is that we have an exhibit that contains every thing that is valuable and interesting, but nothing that the people will not care to see.

The House will also remember that this appropriation was recommended by President Roosevelt in his annual message in the warmest terms. He stated that it was by his order that the exhibits were sent to Charleston. This was in pursuance of the plan to which President McKinley gave his sanction, and which I hope is about to come to a perfect consummation. There is one feature of the President's message that I beg leave to commend particularly to the House. He bases his recommendation in a great measure on the ground that the appropriations should be given because of the exhibition of enterprise by the people of Charleston in carrying through the exposition to a successful result, notwithstanding the serious difficulties they had to encounter. It will be remembered that when the bill for that purpose was defeated in the last Congress it was supposed by many persons that it would be the end of that admirable enterprise. But the people of Charleston, with that quiet but high courage in the face of disaster which they have exhibited on many occasions in the past, made up their minds that, notwithstanding that great disaster, they would carry the exposition through to a successful termination. And the result is, gentlemen, that not only is there displayed in that city what all who have seen it pronounce to be a most admirable exhibit of all the products of our wonderful country, of everything usually displayed on such occasions, but is a most valuable and instructive illustration of what can be accomplished by the energy and enterprise of the American citizen in the face of the greatest possible discouragement. I hope the appropriation will be passed without a dissenting

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a single word on this matter. I do not know but the House and the country are to be congratulated upon the fact that we get off with an appropriation of $90,000 for this show instead of $250,000, the amount asked for at the close of the last session, a proposition which the House de-feated by an overwhelming vote. I have no doubt of the good faith of my friend from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT], who promises that the Government will not be asked to add a single dollar to this appropriation on account of this exposition. I have no doubt he makes it in entire good faith, and I am willing to accept it and to accept it as a contract made on behalf of that exposition

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that when these exhibits were sent there by the President of the United States it was agreed on the part of the exposition company that not a dollar would be asked from the United States in the way of expenses in transporting from the United States in the way of expenses in transporting them or transporting the people who went in charge of them; that all the Government would have to do would be to pay their regular salaries, which it had been paying. At the beginning of this session a joint resolution was passed authorizing the exten-sion of the privilege of bringing in exhibits in bond and turning over the exhibits from the Pan-American to the South Carolina Exposition. Then it was solemnly enacted into law that the Government should not be called upon to pay a single dollar on account of this exposition in South Carolina.

But still they say "three times and out." We have now the third promise made on behalf of this exposition company, and I am inclined to believe that there will not any further proposition come here to pay any more expenses, even from the coordinate breach of Congress: but I do hope, trust, and believe that if any branch of Congress; but I do hope, trust, and believe that if any further demand is made upon the Treasury of the United States on account of this exposition, that we have so many times been assured would not be made, that the House will hold them to their promise in the future and see that no more appropriations of this kind are made.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I beg the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hemenway].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hemenway] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, in the last session of Congress this bill was referred to a subcommittee of which I had the honor to be the head, and, as the members of this House well know, it was defeated by an overwhelming majority on three or four different occasions, the last being the night before Congress adjourned, when it was attached to the appropriations for St. Louis and Buffalo. They were together as one item in the sundry civil bill. It does seem strange that after Congress has determined by an overwhelming majority that no appropriation shall be made for this exposition, we now find down there a Government exhibit; but we all know that that exhibit went there because of a solemn agreement that it would not cost the Government one dollar; that every dollar of expense incident to that ment one dollar; that every dollar of expense incident to that exhibit there would be paid by the exposition company.

But now they come in and say, "You are down there with your exhibit. Would it be fair to allow the people of Charleston to pay for it?" Certainly it would be fair to allow them to pay for it when they have agreed to pay for it. It would not have been down there if they had not agreed to pay for it. But in view of the fact that the exhibit is there, and that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Elliott] assures this House that the $90,000 will cover every dollar of expense, I suppose the House that the $30,000 will cover every dollar of expense, I suppose the House will pass this item. I wish we could commit the Senate side to the same proposition; and if the Senators from South Carolina, when this bill goes to the Senate side, will assure the Congress of the United States that they are not coming back to ask for any more money, then I think we shall be well rid of this matter.

then I think we shall be well rid of this matter.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am much more concerned about the attitude in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has seen fit to place my constituents than about the influence his statements may have upon the success of this appropriation, and I beg to say to the gentleman that he is altogether mistaken in the terms in which he places the agreement of the exposition company. There was never to my knowledge one word raised in pany. There was never, to my knowledge, one word raised in the negotiations over this matter about whether or not the company would ask for an appropriation from the Government for pany would ask for an appropriation from the Government for placing the Government exhibit down there. I do not believe there is a shadow of authority for the statement that the company or its agents ever pledged themselves not to ask the Government for a dollar. That question, so far as I know, was never raised. Would President McKinley have raised it? It was he who first gave sanction to this arrangement which has been carried out so

The company did promise to pay all the expenses of the instal-lation, transportation, and maintenance of the Government exhibit. It has done so; and it did so, as I know, without the slightest expectation that Congress would either be asked to appropriate or would appropriate one dollar for this purpose. My judgment was clearly against the city of Charleston and the State of South Carolina coming back to Congress to make another application for an appropriation after the result of that which was made in the last Congress, and when the question whether the company could afford to undertake the great expense of transporting, installing, and maintaining the Government exhibit was under consideration, at a meeting of the directors called for that special purpose, I stated, in the most explicit language possible, that, in my judgment, there was no possible chance of obtaining an appropriation from this Congress, and that they would have to assume the responsibility with the distinct understanding that they must meet it unaided.

And my mind upon the point was never made up as to asking this appropriation until the President of the United States, in his annual message, gave his sanction to it; not only that, but proposed it. He says:

The people of Charleston, with great energy and civic spirit, are carrying on an exposition which will continue throughout most of the present session of Congress. I heartily commend this exposition to the good will of the people. It deserves all the encouragement that can be given to it. The managers of the Charleston Exposition have requested the Cabinet officers to place thereat the Government exhibits which have been at Buffalo, promising to pay the necessary expenses. I have taken the responsibility of directing that this be done, for I feel that it is due to Charleston to help her in her praissworthy effort. praiseworthy effort.

That is a correct statement of the matter. That is what they have done, are doing, and will do, whether or not this appropria-tion is voted by Congress. The President further says:

In my opinion the management should not be required to pay all these expenses. I earnestly recommend that the Congress appropriate at once the small sum necessary for this purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not the company ask for this appropriation?
Mr. ELLIOTT. Not until the President made this recommendation; and never did I get the consent of my mind to ask for it That is a perfectly true and accurate statement of what has taken place; and they stand ready to-day to carry out their undertaking with the Government, and have done, are doing, and will do it. But the President of the United States saw fit to bring this matter to the attention of Congress, stating that he did not think it proper that the people of Charleston should be required to pay all these expenses. That entirely changed the situation, and I immediately informed the exposition company that I was ready to do all in my power to obtain the appropriation. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. A single word in reply. I had voted against all expositions in all forms; but in view of the fact that the House Committee on Appropriations believed that they should carry out the act of the late President McKinley—and that is all this proposition amounts to; it means to carry out the spirit of the act of the late President without any question of his authority or any criticism upon the exercise of it—I can say to the House that so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, there will be no recommendation for another dollar of appropriation; and I believe what I said in the beginning, that if this substitute is adopted it is the end of all expenditures to be made for this exposition.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by way of a substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, and read a third time.

The amendment striking out the preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was read a third time, and

The amendment recommended to the title was agreed to. On motion of Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

REDEMPTION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the following bill:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6570) to amend the act of May 12, 1900, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps," approved May 12, 1900, be amended by adding to the second proviso the following: "Excepting documentary and proprietary stamps issued under the act of June 18, 1898, which stamps may be redeemed upon presentation within two years after the passage of this act: Provided further, That any such stamps erroneously attached and canceled may be redeemed at any time within two years after the affixing and cancellation of the same," so that said proviso shall read as follows: "Provided further, That no claim for the redemption of or allowance for stamps shall be allowed unless presented within two years after the purchase of said stamps from the Government, excepting documentary and proprietary stamps issued under the act of June 13, 1898, which stamps may be redeemed upon presentation within two years after the passage of this act: Provided further, That any such stamps erroneously attached and canceled may be redeemed at any time within two years after the affixing and cancellation of the same."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill has been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAYNE. This bill was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means at a full meeting and had the unanimous approval of the Committee. I might say in addition, Mr. Speaker, that it only provides for a single thing. The act for the redemption of internal-revenue stamps provided that stamps should be redeemed which the owner had not used within two years of their purchase. At the last session of Congress it was ascertained that there were many people throughout the country who now had stamps that had been purchased more than two years prior to the passage of that act which did away with the use of the stamps, and therefore this bill is brought in simply to allow those stamps under the war-revenue act to be redeemed on which more than two years had expired since the time when they had been purchased.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman will remember that when we were considering that bill in conference we thought the law was broad enough to cover this very class of

Mr. PAYNE. We did not know that stamps had been purchased more than two years prior to the war revenue stamp re-demption act; and I may say that the most of those stamps are found in the hands of individuals who had purchased them two years before the passage of that act and were held by their own negligence; but there are small quantities remaining throughout the country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I could not quite catch the reading of the amendment clearly. Does it also include those stamps which had been placed upon documents and upon proprietary medicines that were not sold and taken up in the hands of the manufacturer?

Mr. PAYNE. It includes all stamps to be redeemed under the war-revenue act where their use was abolished.

Mr. COWHERD. Do I understand that that covers the stamps where the stamps were printed on bank checks?

Mr. PAYNE. I have another joint resolution which refers to that matter, which I desire to ask the House to consider after this joint resolution is passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Missouri has referred to a matter about which I desired to inquire.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly

read the third time, and passed.
On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RETURN OF PAPERS WITH IMPRINTED STAMPS.

Mr. PAYNE. I also ask for the present consideration of the following House joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 88, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to return bank checks, drafts, certificates of deposit, and orders for the payment of money, having imprinted stamps thereon, to the owners thereof, and for other purposes.

Whereas by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1901, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes, approved June 13, 1898, and to reduce taxation thereunder," the internal-revenue tax imposed upon bank checks, drafts, or certificates of deposit not drawing interest, or orders for the payment of any sum of money drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies or corporations, at sight or on demand, was repealed on and after July 1, 1901; and

Whereas many thousands of bank checks, drafts, certificates of deposit, and orders for the payment of money have been imprinted with the necessary stamp and were unused on July 1, 1901; and

Whereas the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to redeem stamps imprinted on said instruments, and which instruments are required by existing laws to be filed with the claims for said redemption of said stamps; and by existing laws to be filed with the claims for said redemption of said stamps, and

Whereas the owners of same are extremely desirous that said checks, drafts, and other papers above mentioned should be returned to them after the cancellation of the stamps imprinted thereon: Now, therefore,

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and is hereby, authorized to return said imprinted instruments to the owner or owners thereof, where said return is demanded, within one year after the passage of this act, after the redemption and cancellation of stamps imprinted thereon; and said cancellation and return to the owner or owners shall be made in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. All such checks, drafts, etc., remaining unclaimed by the owner at the expiration of one year after the passage of this act shall be destroyed in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is aware, I apprehend, that in relation to the law requiring stamps to be placed on checks that the Treasury Department required, under the stamp-re-demption act, that the holders and customers who hold those checks should transfer them to the banks in order to have them redeemed. Does this bill provide for that also?

Mr. PAYNE. It provides for all checks with imprinted stamps presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for redemppresented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for redemption. There are now in the Treasury Department many millions of checks on the upper corridor. They piled them up there in boxes until the superintendent in charge of the building ordered them to stop it, for fear they would break down the floors. They have a larger pile in the basement, and have filled one or two rooms with the checks which the present law requires them to hold. The proposition is to punch a hole through the graphs of the check which can be done expeditionally and accommissibly each check, which can be done expeditiously and economically. each check, which can be done expeditiously and economically. The Commissioner estimates that it will cost from twelve to thirteen thousand dollars to do this, including suitable rooms in which to do it. Many of the checks are finely engraved and they cost a good deal of money, and the banks are anxious to get them. If they go back to the banks, the banks will furnish the checks, with the stamps punched, to the customers. They will return the checks to the customers after the stamps have been redeemed. redeemed.

Mr. BARTLETT. A few days ago I was informed by a number of banks in my city that none of the checks issued by the banks had yet been redeemed by the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. They may be waiting for an appropriation. I presume they are.

Mr. BARTLETT. The banks, under instructions from the Treasury Department, required the patrons of the bank before the checks had been furnished to the Treasurer to assign to the bank all their claim for redemption of the stamps before they could be redeemed.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand some of the claims for stamps have been held up because of the want of an appropriation to pay them, but of course if the joint resolution passes providing for cancellation there will be no longer delay, and they will be returned.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from New York yield long enough for me to offer an amendment to repeal all of the war-revenue taxes?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that would be hardly germane. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if this resolution provides for the redemption of those stamps which have not been returned to the Treasurer?

Mr. PAYNE. The law already provides for the redemption of the stamps and for their preservation in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDOX. I am informed that there is some difficulty in making proof that has been required by the regulations adopted by the Treasury Department—for instance, for a man to swear on what day he obtained the stamps and who from. Does your resolution give the Treasurer any further authority in the matter?

Mr. PAYNE. I think the gentleman misapprehends the difficulty. I think the difficulty has been this, which has been cured by the bill we have just passed. The difficulty was that the stamps had been purchased more than two years before they were presented for redemption. We have cured that by the bill already passed, allowing them to be redeemed any time within two years after this bill is enacted into law.

Mr. MADDOX. And the gentleman thinks that will obviate that difficulty?

Mr. PAYNE. I think that will entirely cure any difficulty of that kind

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly. Mr. JONES of Washington. Does this law allow checks upon which revenue stamps are to be canceled to be used after the stamps are canceled?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering House bill 8581, making appropriations for pensions, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to: and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union

(with Mr. LACEY in the chair).
The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 8581, known as the pension appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs. The Clerk, reading the bill, read as follows:

The Clerk, reading the bill, read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, namely:

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, $138,500,00: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman in the crimina-

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in the crimina-tions and recriminations that have been indulged in by the members of the House who have discussed subjects properly belonging to the bill under consideration, and in the charges and surcharges that have been made upon the subject of the Pension Bureau, and that have been made upon the subject of the Pension Bureau, and features of the pension administration, I think, by oversight, inaccuracies crept into the statements, and think it would be well, if possible, to correct at this time.

I desire to send to the Clerk's desk an article from the Washington Post of this morning, containing statements made on the subject properly before the House by a gentleman who once held a high official position in the Pension Bureau, and who is thoroughly conversant with the facts covered and of which he speaks oughly conversant with the facts covered and of which he speaks. I might suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in trying to sustain an officer or a buread of the Government, either directly or in a perfunctory way, members on this floor should state the facts, and runctory way, members on this floor should state the facts, and not cast reflection on other officers or bureaus. And particularly as bearing upon the question of frauds in the Pension Department, I present this statement from one having knowledge derived from official experience, and which gives him authority to speak on the present conditions of the fact mentioned in the interview. The Clerk will kindly read the statement:

The Clerk read as follows:

In speaking of pension matters last avaning former Commissioner of Pension and Pension matters last avaning former Commissioner of Pension and Pension matters last avaning former Commissioner of Pension and Pension matters last avaning former Commissioner of Pension and Pension Pensi

The Clerk read as follows:

In speaking of pension matters last evening, former Commissioner of Pensions D. I. Murphy said to the Post:

"What the average member of Congress does not know about pensions would make a respectable vacuum. The debate on the pension appropriation in the House of Representatives on Monday exhibited a woeful lack of knowledge of a subject with which every Congressman should be familiar. Judging from the Record, some of the debaters did not know the difference between a service and a disability pension. Others did not seem to understand why the roll had increased while the expenditures had decreased.

"There was a great deal said about fraudulent pensions and false testimony, but the 'criminal data' submitted as coming from the Pension Office, if fairly analyzed, would have shown that, after all the hue and cry, fraudulent pensions are really few and far between.

RECORDS OF THE COURTS.

"I was looking over the last annual report of the Attorney-General to-day and found that while there were pending July 1, 1901, in the United States courts, 3,673 prosecutions for offenses against the internal-revenue laws and 629 for violations of the postal laws, there were but 182 prosecutions under the pension laws. Who ever hears of the frauds against the internal-revenue and postal laws? Yet a constant parade is made of the comparatively few pension frauds. And it should be borne in mind that many of these 182 prosecutions were of attorneys and notaries public and guardians of minors and insane persons.

"That every effort should be made to discover fraud and to stamp it out whenever and wherever found goes without saying. But it seems to me as though in the past few years there has been apparently a persistent and, I may say, malicious effort to discredit and besmirch the entire pension roll.

REACHING THE "PENSION SHARKS."

"The 'pension sharks' we hear so much of could be readily disposed of by the Department under present laws and regulations. And that reminds me that when the second Cleveland Administration came into power in 1893 it was quickly discovered that an attorney in Norfolk, Va.; another in Buffalo, N. Y., and still another in lowa had been running regular pension factories, where bogus applications and fraudulent affidavits were ground out in considerable number. It did not take the then Commissioner, Judge Lochren, long to close up their establishments, destroy their nefarious business, and put the rascally attorneys and some of their clerks behind the bars. Those fellows were sure enough 'pension sharks,' and it seems to me if there are more of their ilk there is a way of getting at them without discrediting the many intelligent and reputable attorneys who practice before the Pension Office."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I could not allow the Pension Bureau to rest under the suspicion expressed by members on this floor that its officers are impotent to deal with frauds and irregularities which have existed in the matter of pensions, or that their labors have not been effective. In my judgment, so far from the Pension Bureau being lax in its vigilance, it has been near the verge of "pernicious activity" in opposition to pension legislation and in the matter of investigation and detection. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "dollars" in line 1, page 2, the following:

"That in all cases of application for pension it shall be presumed in favor of the person on account of whose service pension is claimed, whether living or dead, that the disability for which pension is claimed is not due to his vicious habits, and the acceptance by the United States of any such person into the military or naval service of the United States shall be prima facie evidence that at the time of such acceptance such person was mentally and physically sound, not then suffering from or laboring under any disease, injury, wound, or disability, and the opinion of the boards of surgeons organized by the Commissioner of Pensions shall be received as prima facie evidence that the person on account of whose services pension is claimed received a wound, injury, or contracted a disease or a disability in a pensionable degree while in the military or naval service of the United States. And for the purpose of being able to form a correct opinion, the boards of surgeons must carefully consider the history of the person on account of whose services pension is claimed in connection with other sworn statements offered by the claimant, sufficient for the board to express an opinion that the services of such soldier or sailor sufficiently accounts for the wound, injury, disease, or disability for which the pension is claimed. All of the statements upon which the opinion is based shall be forwarded to the Commissioner of Pensions as part of the report."

Mr. BARNEY. I reserve a point of order upon this amend-

Mr. JENKINS. Before we commence the discussion upon the merits of this amendment, I would like to know exactly what the ground of the point of order is and whether my colleague [Mr. Barney] intends to insist upon it.

Mr. BARNEY. I have simply reserved the point of order. I presume the gentleman is aware that there is no question about the point of order being well taken.

Mr. JENKINS. No point of order is made, as I understand. The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The point of order is made.

I make the point of order that the amendment is a change of existing law.

Mr. JENKINS. In view of the declarations which were made on the other side of the Chamber yesterday and the day before as to the friendly feeling existing toward the old soldiers, I regret very much that the gentleman from Tennessee feels called upon to make any point of order upon this amendment. If there is one thing settled in this country it is that the old soldier who faithfully served his country and is therefore entitled to a pension should have it.

This amendment simply puts it in the power of every soldier who honorably served and who is otherwise entitled to a pension to obtain his pension. We have said by legislation that this class of soldiers shall have pensions, but we interpose insurmountable difficulties. We say to such a one to-day that he must prove that when he entered the service he had no disability whatever. We say to the soldier's widow, who comes here and asks relief from Congress, that she, in her old age, must prove—what she can not prove—that her husband when a young man, in the very prime of life, at the time when he tendered his services to the Government, had no disability whatever to disqualify him for obtaining a pen-

So far as the point of order is concerned, I want to say that this amendment does not change existing law. It simply changes the rule and practice of the Pension Department; that is all. It is an amendment that speaks for itself. It appeals to every gentleman who is honestly in favor of giving to every old soldier or to his widow that to which he or she is justly entitled.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Jenkins] has said, I will simply remark that conceding as fact every statement he has will simply remark that, conceding as fact every statement he has will simply remark that, conceding as fact every statement he has made, our rules provide that we shall not change existing law upon a general appropriation bill. Now, this is a general appropriation bill, and it is proposed here to change existing law by this amendment. Your rules provide how you can change existing law, and if you wish to do that—if this proposed change of law is so highly meritorious—let the law be changed in the regular results of the provider order order.

lar way. I simply call for the regular order.

Mr. BARNEY. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. Jenkins] whether he ever introduced a bill in Congress calling for such a change of law as this amendment proposes to make on this appropriation bill?

Mr. JENKINS. I did.

To what committee was that bill referred? The RECORD shows that it was referred to the Mr. BARNEY. Mr. JENKINS. Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BARNEY. Did they ever report it?
Mr. JENKINS. I think not.
Mr. BARNEY. The gentleman is well aware that the subject is, without any question, within the jurisdiction of that committee.
Mr. JENKINS. When I can not get what I want in one way,

I try to get it in another.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this proposition is new legislation, and has no proper place on an appropria-tion bill. The point of order, therefore, must be sustained.

Mr. Bell was recognized.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk another amendment-

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, if I am recognized, I desire to submit to the Clerk for reading at this time some suggestions upon this subject

Mr. JENKINS. I trust my friend from Colorado will allow me first to have this amendment, which I have sent to the desk, disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JENKINS. But, Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor. I ask the gentleman from Colorado to allow me to submit this other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. Certainly, if I can then be recognized.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 6, after the word "separately," by inserting: "Provided, That in all cases of application for pension wherein evidence of marriage is required, it shall be prima facie evidence of marriage when the applicant proves, by the affidavit of three persons, that the parties whose marriage should be proved cohabited together and held themselves out as husband and wife, and were treated and received as husband and wife, among their friends and neighbors for at least five years."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment and propose to insist upon it when the gentleman from Wisconsin has been heard.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from Georgia, and the House, that I trust all this talk we have indulged in during the last two or three days about the old soldier and his necessities, and about coming together and shaking hands over the bloody chasm, is not mere buncombe.

I understand that my friends on the other side have expressed themselves as entirely ready to meet us, and perfectly willing to aid us in passing just and honest pension claims in favor of these old veterans.

The rules and regulations of the departments in some instances make it almost impossible for these old soldiers or the widows of the old soldiers to obtain a pension. Let me call your attention to one pertinent illustration.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow an interruption?

Mr. JENKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the law ought to be changed, as the gentleman suggests, and if there are meritorious changed, as the gentleman suggests, and if there are meritorious changed. propositions, or pension claims, which are barred by the existing law, why not introduce a bill, get the proper committee to consider and report it, and let the House act upon the same according to its rules, instead of undertaking to legislate in this way and establish a precedent which is contrary to all the rules of the House?

House?

Mr, JENKINS. I wish to say to my friend from Tennessee, as I responded to my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. Barney] a few moments ago, that I did introduce a bill for that purpose which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but up to this time have heard nothing from it, and thought that this would be a good opportunity to correct an injusice to the soldiers, and it is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, if the gentleman will permit me a word further, I wish only to add that the majority of that committee, being composed of gentlemen on that side of the House, and they having failed to approve of the bill introduced by the gentleman, that he ought not to pass any reflections duced by the gentleman, that he ought not to pass any reflections upon gentlemen on this side, who only seek to maintain the rules and practices of the House.

Mr. JENKINS. That position, I think, Mr. Chairman, would scarcely justify my friends who were on the Confederate side from opposing a matter of justice to the old soldiers when an opportunity to do justice is presented.

I do not think it reasonable for a woman who has lived with, and been recognized as the wife of, an old soldier for eighteen or twenty years to be compelled to prove that her husband was competent to marry when she was married to him. I say, therefore, that it is time that the rules of the Pension Department should be changed so that if it be shown that a man and woman have lived together as husband and wife for thirty-odd years and raised a family the presumption should be altogether in her favor, although she may not be able to make convincing proof of the fact that neither were married before, but that under the circumstances she should be entitled to the pension.

Mr. Chairman, I say that if an amendment of this character can not be adopted to-day in the House, we might just as well repeal our pension laws and tell the old soldier of the country that there is not a man on either side of the Chamber who is really a

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.
Mr. JENKINS. I will yield to my friend from Georgia.
Mr. BARTLETT. I have not indulged in any of these remarks which gentlemen have referred to about the old soldier, on either side, but I want to ask the gentleman this question: I agree that the amendment he offered to this law would be a proper amendment to the existing law if it were offered in the proper way, and under such circumstances I would vote for it. Now, is it not a fact that the rule he complains of with reference to requiring the kind of evidence which the gentleman's amendment seeks to correct is a rule made by a Republican Commissioner of Pensions? And is it not true also that if that Commissioner of Pensions and the officers in the Pension Office were to follow the rules of law with reference to proof of marriage which exist in all the States of this Union, and which have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to be correct and sufficient proof of marriage, the amendment that the gentleman offers proof of marriage, the amendment that the gentleman offers would not be necessary? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JENKINS. There may be some truth in what the gentleman from Georgia says; but that is neither here nor there. I have not indulged in any buncombe on the floor of this House about the old soldier. I have not gone out of my way—

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not gone out of my way to say anything concerning the old soldier on either side or anything of that kind; but every gentleman on the other side of this Chamber who knows me personally knows that there is not a man in this House who me personally knows that there is not a man in this House who has a kindlier feeling for the old Confederate than myself. But I either want this buncombe talk on the floor of this House stopped, or else I want gentlemen to stand up here and show by their works and by their actions that they are friends of the old soldier, and that the old soldier has some friends in Congress. But every time a meritorious measure comes up here that will enable the soldiers to get what the general law says they are entitled to, a technical objection is made, and they are denied the rights which they are entitled to under the general law.

I am willing to take the opinion of the Chair, and I regret that one of the grandest soldiers in this Congress is compelled to rule

this amendment out of order. [Applause.] [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin may not have indulged in any buncombe heretofore with reference to the old soldier, but he knows that he has taken this occasion, when the amendment offered by him is a clear, palpable, unmistakable violation of the rules of this House which the majority of the House have adopted, to indulge in a good deal of buncombe for the benefit of the old soldier constituents in his district. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I know the gentleman from Wisconsin. There is not a member on that side of the House whom I esteem more highly than I esteem him. I know him to be generous in his disposition not only to the old soldier and to the soldiers of the South, but also to the people of the South.

He is one of that class of Republicans who fought the South and its people upon the battlefield as brave American soldiers; and its people upon the battlefield as brave American soldiers; and when you find one of those men, you will find that there does not linger in his bosom any animosity toward the foes he met on the battlefield. But in obedience to my duty as a legislator, not on account of any opposition to the granting of proper pensions, not on account of any disposition to approve a rule made by the Republican Commissioner of Pensions and the officials in the Pension Office—a rule which I believe to be wrong—not, Isay, because of any such reasons, but because the rules of this House, which have been made for the orderly conduct of its business and the passage of appropriation bills in the proper way, should be observed; in order that appropriation bills may not be loaded down with riders and legislation improperly ingrafted upon those bills that might not otherwise be passed at all, I felt it my duty to interpose this point of order. terpose this point of order.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Jenkins] knew as well as anyone else that his amendment was not in order under the rule, and he expected that the point of order would be made. and he expected that the point of order would be made. Why, even the chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations having this bill in charge, his own colleague, reserved the point of order; and I take it for granted that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Barney], the chairman of this subcommittee, the colleague of my friend [Mr. Jenkins], was not animated by any feeling against the old soldier. I have interposed this point of order simply because I believe that the write of the Harse capit to have the cause I believe that the rules of the House ought to be observed by everybody.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to ask my friend if he did not stand here yesterday and advocate the opening of National Soldiers' Homes for the benefit of his Confederate friends?

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not, and until my right hand forgets its cunning and until I forget my love and respect for the Confederate soldier, I never will advocate it. [Applause on the Demogratic side.]

cratic side.]
Mr. JENKINS. How can you expect us to open the doors of our National Homes to your friends when you object to the old our National Homes to your friends when you object to the our soldier getting his proper pension?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not hear the gentleman's remark. Will he please repeat it?

Mr. JENKINS. Well, it is good enough to be repeated; but if the gentleman can not hear, I will not take time to repeat.

Mr. BARTLETT. As long as that has been suggested, I want to say as the son of a Confederate officer, who fought for four years in the Confederate army and came home in July, 1865, from a Federal prison, that we cast our lot and our fate when we raised the flag of the Confederacy with that government. We fought for what we believed to be right. We accepted the result of that wager of battle. We have no favor or charity to ask for the Confederate soldiers who now live. The State of Georgia and every Southern State, notwithstanding their poverty, have erected homes and are providing pensions for those disabled Confederate soldiers and the widows of the dead Confederates. We bear the burden of taxation gladly, and not by any vote or advocacy of mine will any Georgia Confederate soldier ask for admission into the Homes provided by this Government for the soldiers who fought for the United States from 1861 to for the solders who fought for the United States from 1861 to 1865. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, without trespassing further upon the time of the committee with utterances of my own, I quote in this connection from the address of an eminent Georgia divine, Bishop Warren A. Candler, delivered to the Confederate Veterans of Georgia on the occasion of delivering crosses of honor to them, conferred by the Daughters of the Confederacy. These words express my own sentiments, and I believe those of my people. I read from the address:

the address:

You have not lived in vain nor suffered in vain. There has been no waste. Blood like that is never poured forth as a futile libation. "For observing our memorial days the Southern people are sometimes upbraided by partisans whose heated passions have consumed their power of clear thought and who mistake the blaze of hate for the glow of patriotism. But surely every thoughtful person must perceive that it is best for the country—for the whole country—that we continue to revere the memory of the men who died for their convictions and ours. When the South turns away indifferently from the humble mounds beneath South turns away indifferently from the humble mounds beneath which her devoted sons are sleeping her living children will have learned the degrading lesson that to die for one's country, to die for one's convictions, is at best a blunder to be forgotten as speedily as possible and not an act of courage to be honored forever. How could any reliance be placed at a time of national peril upon a people grown to be so base?

"The nation was thrilled at the outset of the Spanish-American war by the sight of Southern youths, and even Southern veterans, springing forward for the defense of the flag of our common country. Such a sight would have been impossible if Confederate memories had been despised and Confederate history spit upon during all the years since 1865. Visions of heroic sires inflamed the courage of gallant sons. Men who since the war between the States have struggled through orphanage and poverty inflicted by Federal arms looked on faded gray inchests princed by inflicted by Federal arms looked on faded gray jackets pierced by minie balls, gazed on dented swords and rusted muskets, and were fired to patriotism by those holy relics of illustrious fathers. They dared not be less than brave men in the presence of such sacred treasures. The graves of Confederate dead, never negligible for the base of the base for the base for the base for the presence of the presence of the base for the base for the base for the presence of the presenc lected by Southern women, are the best fortifications of the Fed-

In sacred history we read of how, after the prophet Elisha had died and had been buried, his sepulcher was opened to receive the body of a dead Moabite, and that when the man was let down and touched the bones of the prophet he revived and stood on his feet. Similarly, virtue lingers in the graves of our Confederate dead, and to those shrines must our fainting patriotism repair for refreshment and revival through all the years to come. He who would level those mounds out of sight, or who begrundes who would level those mounds out of sight, or who begrudges the flowers of the springtime for their garnishment, does not truly love the Union, but only hates his fellow-countrymen, hating them even unto death and beyond the grave. Afterwards, in some far-off nobler age, they will be exhumed to preach with mute eloquence the high and holy doctrine that self-sacrifice never fails; that heroism is never in vain; that heaven and earth may pass away, but heroes live forever."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized on the point of order. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for recognition on the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, there has been some discussion on the other side by reason of the fact that gentlemen on this side have raised points of order against amendments offered to a bill because they points of order against amendments offered to a bill because they create new legislation. I do not think it is fair to this House or fair to this side of the House to allow the reflection that has been made to rest where it stands. The Democrats of this House did not adopt the rules under which we do business. They were adopted by the Republican majority. The Republican majority controls the committees of this House. The Republican majority have the power if they see fit to pass such legislation as they believe is justified by their consciences and will be approved by their constituency.

There is a manifest reason outside of all talk or buncombe, outside of all clastrap that may be thrown into a discussion for side of all claptrap that may be thrown into a discussion for votes; there is a manifest reason why a general change of existing law should not be considered in a general appropriation bill. ing law should not be considered in a general appropriation out. When a bill is introduced, in its regular orderly course, it goes to a committee of this House the members of which are schooled by years of experience in the legislation with reference to that particular branch of general legislation to which the bill refers. They are men usually of experience along that particular line. Both sides of the House are represented. They have time to carefully consider and investigate what shall be done with the legislation to see whether all points are covered and whether all points are covered and whether all lation, to see whether all points are covered and whether all dangers are met in the legislation. It can then come before the House and be considered in an orderly way. But when a gentle-man arises on the floor of this House and offers an amendment on a general appropriation bill seeking to change existing laws, with many clauses in the bill, how can the members sitting here on the floor, without the opportunity to investigate the scope of the legislation proposed, understand how far it may go?

How can we find out what dangers may lurk in the language of the bill. It is impossible; and therefore, gentlemen know that when the point of order is raised on this side of the House it is not raised for a partisan purpose, it is not raised to strike at the Federal soldier. Gentlemen on that side of the House know well that the constituencies we represent as a rule draw no pensions, and pay their share without complaining of the pensions which and pay their share without complaining of the pensions which are now paid to Federal soldiers. But when it comes to legislation on that question we are entitled to a fair and careful consideration of the legislation that shall come before this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that a decision by the late Mr. Dingley, a man that all who served with loved and honored, rendered on a similar question to this; and I think the reasons that he gives why legislation of this kind should not be considered in a general arrangement of the same parameters of the same parameters. in a general appropriation bill fully answer the arguments of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I will ask the Clerk to read the portion that I have marked here.

The Clerk read as follows:

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] raises the point of order that the pending paragraph is in violation of clause 2 of Rule XXI, the last paragraph of which—that bearing on the point of order that has been raised—reads as follows:

"Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order on any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

That has been the rule in the consideration of a general appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole for many years. The rule has been modified several times with a view to reducing expenditures, but never so far as this particular point is concerned. The grounds of public policy on which this rule rests are—

First. That inasmuch as general appropriation bills carry the appropriations necessary to maintain the Government, and only appropriations already authorized by existing law, it is of the highest importance that they should not be impeded or jeopardized by differences in the House or differences between the House and Senate or differences between the two Houses and the Executive over any legislative propositions that may be proposed as amendments to such bills, each of which should be tried out on its own merits in separate bills.

Secondly. That in view of the fact that the Committee on Appropriations can only consider the question of appropriations—the subject committed to them by the rules—and that each particular subject of legislation is required to be considered by a standing committee which has the jurisdiction of that subject, each committee should be held to attend to its particular work. If general legislation on the subject of pensions is proposed, the rule requires that such proposition of legislation shall go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and that committee, having the right to report at any time, may on any day bring in any amendment of the pension laws and present it for the consideration of the House, after due consideration as to the effect of such legislation. It is supposed that a special committee having in charge that particular subject has given special attention to such legislation has looked into all its parts, and is able to bring in a bill of a comprehensive character, which when brought into the House may then be subject to amendments in the ordinary way. It has been found by experience that legislation on appropriation bill is in the fact that even if an amendment should be admitted here which is in the fact that even if an amendment should be admitted here which is not he fact, that even if an amendment should be admitted here which is not he fact that even if an amendment should be ad

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have one more word to say in conclusion. If there is any fault in this matter, I do not know the merits or demerits offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. His proposition may be a very meritorious one, one that should be considered and passed by this House, but, under your rules, the rules adopted by the majority of this House, the rules adopted by the party of which the gentleman from Wisconsin is a member, for directing the course that we should pursue, it is subject to the point of order. When his bill goes to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, if it is a meritorious bill, they have a good the majority of this House, and the majority of this House. should report it to this House, and the majority of this House who are charged with the responsibility for legislation, should pass it if it is a good bill. If they do not do it the responsibility rests there and not here.

Mr. NORTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This rule in substantially the present form has been in force for sixty-five years. Whether the House was Democratic or Republican, the rule has been substantially the same except during the period when what was known as the Holman rule was in force—that existing law might be changed on an appropriation bill where the effect of the change was to reduce the expenditure. With the exception of the period during which that rule was in operation, With the this rule has been in existence regardless of what was the political complexion of the House. The Chair has no doubt whatever that this amendment is in violation of the rule, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Robinson] has had read a newspaper letter referring to certain charges of fraud against the pension attorneys. It is pretty hard to tell whether he is criticising the House or the present Pension Commissioner. The present Pension Commissioner, in his report, has expended much space in showing us the activity and un-worthy conduct of a line of pension attorneys or agents, and has asked Congress for relief. Now, I do not desire to have that read, but I do want to put it in the RECORD where everybody may see it. Therefore I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD for that purpose.

As some persons in and out of this House are inclined to minimize the sharp practice of a certain low type of pension attorneys, I wish to make these citations from the Commissioner's report and to append some tables:

Attention is invited to the disreputable methods employed by some attorneys located at San Francisco, Cal., either permanently or temporarily, in soliciting pension claims. It is believed that stringent measures should be adopted to improve the conditions existing there. Nearly all the soldiers returning from the Philippines are there mustered out of the service, and besides the muster out of the regiments as they return to this country, convalescents are constantly being discharged from the Presidio Hospital on surgeons' certificates of disability. Payments are made to these discharged soldiers at the Presidio and at the headquarters of the Department of California, U. S. A., in the Phelan Building. The general ticket offices of nearly all of the railroad companies are in close proximity to the Phelan Building, and for the convenience of the soldiers discharged at the Presidio Reservation there is a consolidated ticket office in the grounds. Naturally the soldiers, on their way to their homes, are anxious to leave San Francisco as soon as possible after their discharge, and competition between attorneys in procuring them to execute declarations for pension before leaving San Francisco has been sharp and keen in the extreme, nor has the business been confined to the resident attorneys.

One or two Washington attorneys closed their offices here and removed to San Francisco to resume business there, while several others established branch offices in San Francisco, with lieutenants to act for them. The offices of these attorneys are in the neighborhood either of the Presidio or the Phelan Building, and some have offices near both places. The methods employed by them in securing business have been as various as the character of the attorneys engaged therein. The distribution of circulars among the soldiers prior to their discharge, which is not prohibited, was soon found to be entirely inadequate to satisfy the ambitions of one class of attorneys, who proceeded to hire men employed in various capacities at the Presidio to act as solicitors for them. Men and women were sent into the Presidio to act as solicitors to the sick, under the guise of charity and various other pretexts, whose only purpose was to pour into the ears of such soldiers as they could glowing accounts of the system of pensions provided by law and the merits of some particular attorney who made a business of prosecuting claims. Soldiers were procured to execute declarations for pension before their disharge, and such declarations were postdated and retained by the attorneys until after the muster out, when they were forwarded to the Pension Bureau.

That the business of procuring the filing of pension claims is a lucrative one for the "solicitors," "cappers," or "grafters," as they are called in San Francisco, employed by attorneys, is evident from the amount paid for each claim secured, which ranges from $2.50 for a gunshot-wound case and $2 for a straight disability case on a surgeon's certificate of disability down to $1, according to the element of uncertainty that may enter into the claim. This practice is responsible for the filing of a large number of claims that are without merit. Its actual operations are best shown by citing a few cases which are not exceptional in their character and which illustrate the results of the system adopted by attorneys and their representatives to secure claims. The regulations of the War Department require a preliminary examination of "Declaration of person to be mustered out of service or discharged.

"Q. Have you any reason to believe that at the present time you are suffering from the effects of any wound, injury, or disease, or that you have any disability or impairment of health, whether incurred in the military service or otherwise?

and that have represented them are true in every respect and are correctly recorded."

The soldier in question is unable to write his name, but signed his mark to the above declaration, which was attested by the first lieutenant of his company, and is dated at Presidio, March 5, 1901. The certificate of the company commander is as follows:

commander is as follows:

"Q. Do you know, or have you any reason to believe, aside from his own statement, that the person who made and signed the foregoing declaration is disabled or impaired in health at the present time by reason of any wound, injury, or disease, whether incurred in the military service of the United States or otherwise?

"A. No. * * * I certify that the foregoing statement is correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

Said certificate is signed by the first lieutenant of the company in which the soldier served, and is dated at Presidio, March 5, 1901. The certificate of the examining surgeon in the case is as follows:

"Q. Have you subjected the person named above to a thorough physical examination?

"A. Yes.

the examining surgeon in the case is as follows:

"Q. Have you subjected the person named above to a thorough physical examination?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Do you find that at the present time he has any disability, whether incurred in the military service or not?

"A. None. * * * fertify that the foregoing statement is correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

Said certificate is signed by the major and surgeon of the regiment, and is dated at Presidio, March 9, 1801. The soldier was mustered out of the service on March 16. On the same day he executed a declaration for pension. Said declaration is partially in the handwriting of a certain attorney, who also claims to be a surgeon, and who advertises medical examinations free to all his clients. The declaration purports to have been sworn to in the presence of two witnesses, before a notary public, and in it the identical soldier referred to above swears that he is physically disabled from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor by reason of the following injuries, received in the service of the United States, for which he claims pension, namely:

Disease of the stomach.

Lumbago.

Pain in back.

Irritable heart.

Judging from this declaration, the soldier in question is pretty badly disabled, and if he can prove half of the disabilities alleged by him he is entitled to a comparatively large pension; but he evidently had no idea that he had any disability whatever a week before he executed his declaration, and the surgeon of the regiment certifies that he then underwent a thorough physical examination, which disclosed no physical impairment whatever.

Another case may be cited of a soldier in the same regiment (claim No. 186227) who, upon his examination, in asswer to the question whether he believed he was suffering from the effects of any wound, injury, or disease, or any disability or impairment of health, whether incurred in the military service or oth

The above examination was held on March 11, 1901. The soldier was discharged on March 16, and on the same date he executed a declaration for pension in the presence of two witnesses, before a notary public, which declaration is mostly in the handwriting of the same attorney as the former case, and in it the soldier alleges that he is physically disabled from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor by reason of the following injuries received in the service of the United States, for which he claims pension, namely: Stomach and bowel trouble (chronic diarrhea), resulting in disease of rectum (piles); also rheumatism, affecting heart.

In the case of another soldier in the same regiment (No. 1264322), the sol dier underwent his preliminary examination on March 5, 1901, and alleged that he was suffering with soreness and stiffness in the right leg below the knee. The first lieutenant of his regiment certified that he had no knowledge of any disability of said soldier, aside from his own statement. The major and surgeon of the regiment certified that after subjecting the soldier to a thorough physical examination he was unable to find any disability whatever. The soldier then appeared before the board of examining surgeons for mustering out volunteers, composed of two assistant surgeons. United States Volunteers, and they certify that after carefully examining the soldier they find that he has no disability. On the 16th of March, the day of his discharge, the same soldier executed a declaration for pension, in the presence of two witnesses before a notary public, alleging that prior to his entering the service he was a man of good, sound physical health, but is now physically disabilities, namely:

Injury to right leg.

Disease of urinary organs.

Malarial poisoning.

Stomach and results.

Disease of teeth.

It is shown that the first unfortunate young man had no education. Doubtless these sharp, aggressive despoilers of human character really made him believe that all of these troubles were fixed in his system, and the mortal dread of the future will probably make a confirmed hypochondriac of him.

These unfortunates should be protected from the sinister motives of these pirates who would willingly consign the soldier to perdition for his paltry fee. There is an abundance of reputable pension attorneys who will look after the cases of those having real disabilities, and the great majority of the soldiers are of that high intellectual standard that lifts them above the machinitions of these vultures; but such reprehense should be haveted downers. of these vultures; but such reprobates should be hunted down and prohibited from practicing before any department or elsewhere out of a penitentiary.

The Commissioner says, June 30, 1901, "high-water mark" was reached in the number of pensioners on the roll, aggregating 997,735, being a net increase of 4,206 since the close of the year 1900.

The total number of pensioners, classified by different wars and laws, as compared with former years since 1897, is as follows:

A large number of these pending claims are duplicate claims, i. e., two or more claims by the same claimant under different laws, and when one of the claims is favorably adjudicated the claim filed by the claimant under another law, or the claim for accrued pension, as the case may be, is generally adjudicated at the same time.

Mr. WARNOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There has been a very wide range in the discussion of this bill; so wide, in fact, that I am afraid that a great many of the gentlemen have forgotten the matter under discussion. I am glad, however, to note this fact, that in all the utterances upon this floor, however conflicting they may have been, all unite upon this one proposition, to wit, that wise and just pension laws are the proper duty of a nation.

I am glad, also, to notice that in the different views which have been expressed on these subjects everyone who has spoken has indicated that he will vote for the bill which is now before the

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that this unanimity of sentiment is the representative tribute of the American people to the patriotism, services, and valor of the American soldier. While it is true that there is, as I have said, a unanimity of sentiment on this proposition, there has also been a great deal of criticism and very divergent that have been approximated that have been approximated that have been approximated that have been presented. gent views upon many questions that have been presented, some of which, I think, are not germane to the question under discussion. I admit that many of these criticisms are just, and I also unite and will unite in enforcing some of the criticisms that have been made upon the administration of the pension laws.

In saying what I may have to say on this subject I do not desire to be understood as reflecting upon the Commissioner of Pensions in any way, for I never have received anything but the most cour-teous treatment at his hands and the most liberal interpretation of the law so far as he was concerned. I believe Commissioner Evans to be a faithful, conscientious official, and that he adminis-ters the law fairly and justly. But you will all concede that in the hundreds of thousands of cases that are brought before the Pension Department it is absolutely a physical impossibility for the Commissioner of Pensions to give his personal attention to those individuals cases. We all know that as matter of practice these cases are considered by the chiefs of divisions, by examin-ing boards, and are brought under the provisions of certain rules of practice, and it is to those rules of practice, rether than to the of practice, and it is to those rules of practice, rather than to the Commissioner of Pensions and his subordinates, that I desire to offer my criticism. I desire, at some day in the near future, unless some other person shall take occasion to do it, to present a bill in sympathy with the object sought by the amendment offered here this day.

The criticism I have to offer first is this, that under the rules of the Pension Office the claimant is bound to satisfy the depart-ment beyond a reasonable doubt. Under the criminal laws of every civilized country a man charged with crime is to be proved guilty of that crime beyond a reasonable doubt. But in every civil tribunal, in every question involving a title to real estate, in every question involving the items of contract, in every question between individuals or corporations, in every great question affecting the civil rights of the people, the tribunals only require that before one shall succeed he shall establish his claim by the fair weight of the testimony. It remains for the pension de-partment alone to establish the rule that before an old soldier or his widow will be granted a pension he must establish his or her right thereto beyond a reasonable doubt.

I have in mind a case now pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, which illustrates what I conceive to be the injustice of this rule. Every affidavit in connection with this case I have carefully read, as well as every opinion that has been given, for the case was appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and after reading those affidavits and opinions I have been satisfied that, if such evidence had been presented in an ordinary court in a case involving the title to property or any other matter pending in a involving the little to property or any other matter pending in a civil court between ordinary parties, I could go into any court in the civilized world and gain the case, for the fair weight of the testimony is in favor of the claim made. Yet it can not be said that the case is made out "beyond a reasonable doubt" as that language is construed at the Pension Bureau. I say that the rule to which I now refer has been adopted by the Pension Bureau without any warrant of law. There is nothing indicating out any warrant of law. There is nothing indicating—

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that ension cases are presented ex parte; only one side is heard, so pension cases are presented ex parte; only one side is heard, so that the question of preponderance of evidence can not arise in such a case. Is not that consideration an important one?

Mr. WARNOCK. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that these applications for pensions are not heard exclusively ex parte. In the case that I speak of a special examiner went into the neighborhood where the applicant resides and called witnesses, who were heard ex parte in opposition to the application, the applicant having no opportunity to examine those witnesses. It is upon this sort of testimony, brought out by special examiner who hunted up witnesses and took their evidence exparte, without the knowledge of the claimant, that many of these cases are decided.

In this case the applicant had no opportunity to know the evidence that was being brought forward against his claim, save as I obtained knowledge of it myself at the department since I came to the city of Washington. So that, instead of there being an ex to the city of Washington. So that, instead of there being an exparte case in behalf of the applicant, the proceeding is more exparte on the side of the Government. Such a thing is not right. I believe that there ought to be such legislation as will give a claimant under these circumstances an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses who are examined in opposition to his claim. I believe that if such opportunity was afforded it would preserve the rights of many an applicant who is now denied the benefit of the provisions of law which Congress has enacted in his behalf his behalf.

Mr. SULZER. Why do not the representatives of the Republican party bring in an amendment to the law to that effect?

Mr. WARNOCK. Well, if I had been in Congress before this term I would have done so long ago. I will do so at the first opportunity.
Mr. SULZER. I hope so, and I will support the gentleman in securing such an amendment to the law.

Mr. WARNOCK. I hope to be supported by the gentleman and many others on his side. Many of our soldiers at the close of the war, and for many years thereafter, would not apply for a pension because they were able to make a living and were too pension to get the property of soldiers and were too. proud to put themselves in the position of seeking help from the Government. That certainly was an honorable feeling, and yet that fact is made one reason for requiring a claim that is presented for the first time, years after the war closed, to be established beyond a reasonable doubt. The mere fact that a man has not asserted his claim to any legal right he may possess until after the lapse of many years, does not of itself require him in our civil courts to establish that right beyond a reasonable doubt, but only by the fair weight of the evidence. The great lapse of time may, however, be a circumstance that may be considered in passing upon the weight of his testimony. If there be no statute of limitations in the way, the plaintiff in our civil courts can recover as well after thirty years on the fair weight of the evidence as he could in three ways. as he could in three years.

Another rule or practice of the Pension Office to which I most emphatically object and for which I can find no warrant in the is that which rejects a claim for pension on the ground that the claimant has no hospital record showing the disability on account of which he asks for a pension. I have received several notices of the rejection of claims for pensions in which the only reason assigned for the rejection was that the claimant had no hospital record. If there were other reasons they were not dis-

Some of the best soldiers I ever knew incurred disabilities in the Army during the civil war and yet never had any hospital record. One of them lies at his home in Urbana, Ohio, to-day, a total wreck, from the effects of the concussion of an exploding shell at the battle of Chickamauga. He was not struck by any piece of the shell, but it exploded so near him as to knock him down and injure his left eye and ear. He was not sent to the hospital; but as the years advanced the sight and hearing became weaker and duller, until he became totally blind in the left eye and deaf in the left ear, causing him the most intense pain for the last few years, and resulting in nervous prostration. He did not apply for a pension for twenty years after the war, and only obtained an allowance of $10 per month. He was refused more because he had no hospital record. This decision was rendered within the last six months.

Another case: A man in my regiment was injured at $\sqrt{1}\ \text{anish}$ Fort, Ala., in April, 1865, while lifting some timbers in the construction of some fortifications at that place. The injury resulted in hernia. He preferred to remain in his tent, and his injury was of such character that he could do so very well. He has no hospital record. The hernia did not trouble him so much at first, and by the use of a truss he could get along very well. He was also shot in the hand, which resulted in the great impairment of its use. He did not apply for any pension for any cause until more than twenty years after the war, and then did not mention "hernia," as he could get along fairly well with a truss, but the hernia gradually grew worse, until he at last made application for an increase of pension on account of hernia. He has filled affide. an increase of pension on account of hernia. He has filed affidavits of his old comrades and others, showing by the fair weight of the testimony that the hernia resulted from the injury at Spanish Fort in April, 1865, and yet, because the claimant has no hospital record, the testimony is not deemed sufficient because it does not establish the origin of the hernia in the service beyond a research be don't. The absence of a hernial record which have reasonable doubt. The absence of a hospital record, which I have reasonable doubt. The absence of a hospital record, which I have always considered a credit to the soldier, has become by the rulings of the Pension Office a badge of such suspicious conduct on the part of the claimant that he is compelled to remove it by the establishment of his claim beyond a reasonable doubt.

Another rule or practice which I think is unjust to the old soldier is that adopted by the medical board of examiners at Washington, who seem to utterly disregard the reports of the local examining boards, and, without ever having seen the soldier assume to be able to decide better as to what rating a soldier should have from the written reports of the examining board than the examining boards could possibly do from a personal inspection of the soldier himself. If the local examining boards are unfit or incompetent, get rid of them. If they are competent and suitable men, then, in the absence of fraud, the old soldier should have the benefit of the rating given by men who have personally examined him, and not be compelled to take the rating of men sitting in their offices hundreds of miles away from the old soldier.

It is no doubt true that there are county pension examiners who are illiterate and incompetent, but that is no reason why the old soldier should suffer. If the examiner's report is not intelligent or full enough to show that the local board understood the soldier's case, let it be sent back until a satisfactory report is made; and when it appears that the local board does understand the case, let the report stand. What I object to is that these gentlemen in Washington set aside the ratings given by local boards, who are just as competent to decide what the soldier is entitled to receive as they are. In each of the six counties composing the district I have the honor to represent there is an examining board just as competent to decide these questions as the medical board at Washington. Why should these local boards be mere figureheads? If they have not the power to fix a rating that will be binding, let the power be given so that it will be binding except in case of fraud or evident mistake.

Again, there seem to be rules in regard to cumulative disabilities which are unjust to the old soldier. I have known many men who are afflicted with a number of different disabilities of service origin who, under the rulings, can not receive over $17 per month, and yet they are unable to perform any manual labor. They are worse off than the man who has lost a hand or a foot, and yet these men without hand or foot get $30 per month, and that is not too much; but the other man, who is almost a total wreck from hernia, rheumatism, heart disease, and chronic diarrhea, can not, under the rulings, get over $17 per month. There is something wrong about the system.

One of my constituents lately received a notice of the rejection of his claim for increase of pension, and the language used was in substance as follows: "Your claim for increase of pension is rejected, for the reason that the $12 per month you are now receiving is commensurate with your disabilities of chronic diarrhea, rheumatism, heart disease, scurvy, and consequent loss of teeth." I would like for the medical board at Washington who teeth." I would like for the medical board at Washington who made that ruling to see that old soldier. If he lived in Washington his pension would not pay his dentist bill.

Another class of claimants whose applications are subjected to vexatious and technical objections is the widow of the deceased soldier. This is not always the case. The Commissioner of Pensions, when the widow is very old or very poor, has in many cases personally gone out of his way to have such cases allowed at once, and he is deserving of credit for that; but necessarily he would be unable to take up many individual cases.

The most vexatious and technical rule in this class of cases is that which requires a widow, who was married before the war or that which requires a widow, who was married before the war or during the war and lived with her husband for twenty or thirty or forty years and raised a family, not only to prove with great detail the fact of the marriage, but the further fact that although she may have lived with her husband for forty years she is also required to prove that the husband and wife had never before been married to any other person and have never since been married to any other person. In one case now pending the widow is over 70 years old. She was married to the deceased soldier over fifty years ago. Her case is held up because she has been unable to get witnesses who knew her husband and herself fifty years ago who can testify from their own knowledge that neither of ago who can testify from their own knowledge that neither of them was ever married before.

As I said in the beginning, I intend to introduce a bill, and shall try to have it enacted into a law, to free the Pension Office of these rules, which have been handed down from one administration to another, and some of which are the result of decisions by the Secretary of the Interior or his predecessors.

I desire to say again, in closing, that these criticisms are made not on the Commissioner of Pensions or his subordinates, but upon the unreasonable decisions and precedents which have grown up with the years, and thus have the binding force of law upon them, and which I believe they would gladly see changed.

These much-needed changes I shall endeavor to bring to the attention of Congress in an amendment which I shall offer to the existing pension laws. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON obtained the floor.

Mr. NORTON obtained the hoor.

Mr. BARNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I desire to ask unanimous consent that all members of the House be allowed ten days to print remarks in the Record on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. A general order of that kind, the Chair thinks, would have to be made in the House; it is beyond the power of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RARNEY. Then if the gentleman from Ohio will yield

Mr. BARNEY. Then, if the gentleman from Ohio will yield for a moment, I move that debate on the pending paragraph be closed in five minutes

Mr. NORTON. All right; I shall not require that much time.
Mr. GIBSON. Make it ten minutes.
Mr. BARNEY. Very well; let it be ten minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I think that my position upon this question and upon all questions arising from or growing out of the pension laws is too well known in this House to need any explanation. I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I am in sympathy with any amendment that will relieve our old veterans from grievous and unnecessary burdens, but we are confronted at the outset by a rule and the statement that this is new legislation, and the rule will not allow it.

We are governed by rules, often to the exclusion of law. gress has placed the seal of its disapproval upon certain actions regarding postal affairs, and the Post-Office Department at once passes a rule which takes precedence of law and establishes that which we condemn.

Congress lays down laws in harmony with the sentiment and judgment of the people whom we represent, and some underling in some department steps in with a rule and nullifies the law. In the Pension Department the old soldier presents his claim, no matter how meritorious, establishes it in conformity with law, but is turned down by a rule. Time goes hurrying by, my old comrades fast approaching the last hour in their days of life, many in want and suffering, and they are precluded from just relief, just dues, and their just right by a rule. Yes; this is new legislation, but new legislation is needed, legislation that no rule can set aside and make of no effect.

I see many gentlemen on the other side of the House who wear the button of the Grand Army, buttons of the Army of the Cumberland, and buttons of the veteran corps; many of you have been decorated for bravery on the field, and now I ask you, gen-tlemen, which one of you has ever come down to the room of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and sought to have a general bill

Committee on Invalid Pensions and sought to have a general bill framed to accomplish the object proposed by this amendment.

I challenge contradiction of the statement that not one of you on the Republican side has done so. More than this, when this committee has drafted a measure tending to give relief to the soldiers, your side of the House has antagonized and defeated it. Now, I propose to put this matter to the test. According to all your campaign talk, we need not expect much sympathy for pensions on this side.

Well, even if this he true, we are not hypocritical and talk one.

Well, even if this be true, we are not hypocritical and talk one way on the stump and vote the other way here on this floor. It is not our business to present pension laws for the benefit of the soldier that we, as a minority and unaided by you, have not the power to carry through. That duty, gentlemen, belongs to you, the party now in power; an 1 yet I promise you that if you will not do it I shall offer a general bill, by the terms of which the Pension Department will be compelled to do simple justice to the old soldiers and carry out the spirit and the letter of the law. If you are honest in your professions of regard and friendship for the old soldiers, you will join with me in demanding that the veteran shall be given the benefit of the doubt.

You will aid in establishing a rule that the enlistment and mustering in of a soldier in 1861–1865 is prima facie evidence of his being in sound physical health at that time, and if it be denied, then that the burden of proof shall be upon the Government.

I know we are tied up here by rules, but it would be an easy matter for the way to be opened for friendly legislation if the Committee on Rules should see fit so to do.

As I said, you shall have a bill presented, if you do not your-selves introduce one, which will prevent the Commissioner of Pensions or any of his subordinates from making rules which, in violation of law, deny to the old soldiers their rights under the law; and when that bill comes I hope to see men on the other side of the House who carry the title "general," but who were privates during the war—men who are bearing the badges of the Grand Army and other organizations—stand by the old soldier, and, if necessary, abrogate rules in order to secure just legislation for their old converdes. for their old comrades.

I have no fear for the old soldier who occupies the chair as Speaker of the House. He will do all in his power to give us fair play. Judging, however, from past experience, I believe you Republicans will avoid action on every occasion wherever you can. For days you have sat here discussing matters connected with pensions. What has any one of you dared to do in behalf of the old soldier?

I see my colleagues from Ohio sitting across the aisle, and I say to them, "You have not offered to increase the amount of apsay to them, "You have not offered to increase the amount of appropriations for pensions a single penny, have you? You have not sought to do away with a single rule that has been placed illegally in the way of justice to the veteran, have you?" It is a revival of the old question; we meet the influence which all along has interposed its noxious spell against the soldier interest. When our late President, William McKinley, said that the money interests were opposed to pension legislation, he exposed the whole secret.

Patriotism, gratitude, and honor to the brave boys in blue stands as naught when the wishes of Wall street are at stake. The dark days of our nation's struggle are forgotten and the heroes who made this nation possible are ignored with contemptuous disregard when the hand of corporate greed sways the whip. With pitiful, whining cant our Republican friends prate of economy and zealous guard of the Treasury when some effort is made to soften the declining years of our country's heroes, but when a subsidy bill comes in here or any measure appropriating millions and millions for the exploitation of some imperialistic scheme, you can not back it up and support it by voice and vote too quickly in your eagerness to show your fealty and devotion to your syndicated masters. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That in adjudicating pension claims, or any material question involved in a pension claim, the Pension Bureau shall be governed by the preponderance of the proof, and shall not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to what part of the section his amendment applies? Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order against the amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order, which, in the opinion of the Chair, must be sus-

Mr. GIBSON. But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is substantially the same point which has already been ruled upon.

Mr. GIBSON. The Chair is mistaken. This amendment has not been presented before.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is substantially the same in that it seeks to ingraft new legislation upon an appropriation bill. In other words, it changes existing law.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the Chair to hear me a few moments on that proposition, and, if necessary, will move to strike out the last word

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is a lawyer on the floor of this House who would be willing to say, upon his professional honor and judgment, that under the laws granting pensions there is any provision which authorizes the Pension Bureau to require that the proof in favor of a pension shall be proof beyond all reasonable doubt. Every member of the bar in the House who has expressed an opinion on the subject has declared that it is not the law; and yet the Pension Bureau has undertaken to establish such a rule.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered does not propose to change any law, but is a simple declaration of what the law is; and that being the case, where an amendment of this character is offered to a bill, which simply declares the law for the inter is offered to a bill, which simply declares the law for the information, instruction, and guidance of the officers of the Government, can it be said with any reasonable degree of propriety that the amendment "changes existing law?"

I think the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole must agree with me that the amendment simply declares what the law is to-day, and must be taken as an instruction to the Pension Bureau that its ruling, requiring proof in pension cases beyond all reasonable doubt, is not in accordance with the existing law and must be no longer observed. must be no longer observed.

The object of the amendment, therefore, is not to "change existing law," but to call attention to those rulings and orders of the Bureau which are contrary to the law.

Mr. Chairman, I ask you to give a patient consideration to that point. I repeat, the amendment is simply declaratory of the existing law, the law that prevails in all the courts of the United States, and the Pension Bureau, in view of the fact that it must hear and consider testimony, is itself to that extent a court of the United States. Every tribunal that passes upon questions that require evidence to enable it to reach a conclusion is pro hac vice a court, and the Pension Bureau is to this extent a court; and, Mr. Chairman, as a court it transacts more judicial business than all of the tribunals in the United States put together.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly. Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why does the present Commissioner of Pensions apply the rule that is applied in criminal cases—that is, that there shall be proof beyond reasonable doubt—to civil cases in that Bureau?

Mr. GIBSON. I can not answer the gentleman. I only know that it is done in that Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What was the rule which prevailed before the administration of the present Commissioner?

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman will agree, I take it, that the rule of evidence in all courts in civil suits only requires a preponderance of proof.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is the general rule in civil cases, but why has a change been made in the Bureau which requires a different proof, such as is required in the courts in criminal case

Mr. GIBSON. I will ask the gentleman if the amendment I have offered is not merely declaratory of what the law is?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am trying to find out exactly what the rules are. I do not know what the law is down in the Pension Office. I know what the rule of law is in criminal cases and in civil cases as to evidence, but I do not know what sort of law they administer down in the Pension Office.

Mr. GIBSON. I can not answer what the rule has been here-Air. GHBSON. I can not answer what the rule has been heretofore, but I produced the book yesterday showing the rule of practice in the Pension Bureau, which states that on material questions proof beyond a reasonable doubt must be produced.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. GHBSON. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did you ever hear of that rule being applied in any case except a criminal case before?

Mr. GHBSON. Never in all my life and I was admitted to the

Mr. GIBSON. Never in all my life, and I was admitted to the bar in December, 1865, and have been in the courts as lawyer or judge ever since

Mr. BARTLETT. What other tribunal that determines questions of fact in civil cases, except the Pension Bureau, requires proof to be offered further than to establish the fact by a preponderance of evidence?

Mr. GIBSON. If there be any other, I never heard of it. MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAHON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Pruden, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On January 13, 1902: An act (H. R. 7471) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for transcripts of records and plats in the General Land Office.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that Mr. BARNEY.

Mr. BARNEY. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that time for the discussion of this paragraph is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has been discussing the point of order and the Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Bearing on the point of order, I should like to have my colleague [Mr. GIBSON] insert that rule of the Pension Office in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the Chair kindly suspend until I get that rule in the RECORD? No one on our side has seen it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I simply want to ask my colleague [Mr. Gibson] to insert that rule in the Record, so that we can see it. My colleague says it is a rule laid down by the Commissioner to require proof "beyond a reasonable doubt," as in criminal cases, in order for an applicant for a pension to prove his case. Will my colleague please put that rule in the Record, so we can all see it?

Mr. GIBSON. It is in my remarks of yesterday.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I may not see that speech I want that rule to-morrow.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman can read the rule in my remarks

f yesterday.

Mr. VANDIVER. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point

of order.

Speaker Carlisle, in the Forty-sixth Congress, ruled upon this question, that where an attempt was made to change the rules of construction adopted by a department or bureau—and a pension case was before the House at that time—that the attempt by Congress to control the rules and regulations of a department was a change of existing law; that, in short, it was legislation. The same rule has been adopted by different Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole and different Speakers. This is undoubtedly new legislation and a change of existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri.
Mr. VANDIVER. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.
Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be allowed to go into the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Missouri. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee later, if he desires to submit a request for unanimous

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments is exhausted; that the time for debate has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on this paragraph, but amendments are in order. Mr. BARNEY. Amendments are in order, but debate is not. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will subm The gentleman from Missouri will submit his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of line 6, page 2, the following: "Provided further. That all soldiers of the various State troops, home guards, and State militia who rendered service—ninety days or more—in said organizations for the maintenance of the Union and suppression of the rebellion in the war of 1861 to 1865 shall be entitled to the same privileges and benefits under the act of June 27, 1890, as other United States troops."

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order and the Chair sustains it. Debate on this paragraph is exhausted. No amendments are pending and the Clerk will read.

Mr. VANDIVER. I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this paragraph has expired and the Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, for services rendered within the fiscal year 1903, $300,000. And each member of each examining board shall, as now authorized by law, receive the sum of $2 for the examination of each applicant whenever five or a less number shall be examined on any one day, and $1 for the examination of each additional applicant on such day; Provided, That if 20 or more applicants appear on one day, no fewer than 20 shall, if practicable, be examined on said day, and that if fewer examinations be then made, 20 or more having appeared, then there shall be paid for the first examinations made on the next examination day the fee of $1 only until 20 examinations shall have been made: Provided further, That no fee shall be paid to any member of an examining board unless personally present and assisting in the examination of applicant: And provided further, That the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically state the rating which in their judgment the applicant is entitled to, and the report of such examining surgeons shall specifically and accurately set forth the physical condition of the applicant, each and every existing disability being fully and carefully described. The reports of the special examiners of the Bureau of Pensions shall be open to inspection and copy by the applicant or his attorney, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin in charge of the bill is recognized. Mr. BARNEY. I have

I have not asked recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 12, amend by striking all out after the word "applicant" down to the word "Provided" in line 21, and in lieu thereof insert: "Provided, That if more than ten applicants appear on one day examinations shall be continued from day to day until all be examined."

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to withdraw the amendment for the present, and make a point of order upon the entire paragraph, from line 7 to line 21, to the word "Provided," and then I will not go any further with my objection to it. The whole paragraph down to that place changes existing law. The general statute monthly for examining heards is in section 4777. general statute upon this for examining boards is in section 4777, General Statutes.

Mr. BARNEY. I will ask the gentleman this question: Do you not consider that part of the appropriation bills passed at any session is just as much existing law as any other statute of the United States?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. How does it come, then, that it is necessary to reenact this particular paragraph every time a pension appropriation bill is passed?

This business began a good while ago. I think it was in 1885 that the Appropriations Committee first took charge of the pension law and undertook to regulate it by riders upon this appropriation bill; and from that time to this every time a pension appropriation bill is considered it has this rider. Why is it necessary if it is existing law? It is not "existing law" in that sense. This calls for a construction of that term.

I ask the attention of the Chair, because I mean to have a ruling upon it before I quit. The original act of June 14, 1862, provided for the examination of the applicant and for a fee of $2; afterwards, in 1873, provision was made requiring biennial examinations, and still the fee was $2; in 1882 the general statute was passed providing $2 for the examining board of three and providing for a fee of $2 for each suppose in the content of the statute was passed providing $2 for the examining board of three and providing $2 for each suppose in the content of the statute was passed provided. ing for a fee of $2 for each surgeon in the case of each applicant. In 1885 the Appropriations Committee on the pension appropriation bill changed that "existing law" by passing this rider in an appropriation bill, and it has found it necessary to do that thing every time it passes an appropriation bill on this subject from that time to this.

If it is "existing law," this rider is not necessary and does not belong here. I say the existing law is general statute section 4777, which has never been repealed except by implication; it has never been repealed by any direct action of the House, and there never been repealed by any direct action of the House, and there never has been any intention to repeal it. This provision has been put in as a rider for the purpose of satisfying somebody that now the examining boards would be compelled to do their work without getting too much money for it. I do not think this paragraph of the bill was considered very much by the Committee on Appropriations bringing in this bill.

I do not care to discuss or criticise the action of the same and the committee of the committee.

I do not care to discuss or criticise the action of the committee, but in view of the fact that the committee took up the consideration of the bill last Thursday or Friday morning at 11 o'clock, and at twenty-five minutes after 11 it was completed, and a few minutes after noon it was reported to the House, and that evening sent to the Printer to be printed, in order that next day, after twenty-five minutes' consideration in preparing it, we might have the bill for examination and debate in the House here, I do not believe that that kind of consideration and preparation of the bill justifies the chairman of the committee in raising the point of order against any amendment to this paragraph. Now, there is a reason for the amendment; and I desire to discuss that when we have had a ruling upon the question of whether the point of order is good.

Mr. BARNEY. I desire to make the point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I want a ruling as to my point of order.

I have asked to have the amendment held in abeyance until I can have a ruling upon the point of order made against the entire paragraph from line 6 to the end, that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill as to what the existing law is prior to the enactment of this bill on this point?

Mr. BARNEY. Upon the subject of the payment of the examining surgeons? Well, it is somewhat different from what it is in this bill. Just exactly what the law is I am unable to state at the present time. I simply know that this provision has appeared in every pension appropriation bill ever since I have been on the committee, and I understand that it is the law to-day in reference to the payment of examining surgeons; for the gentleman will understand, and we all know, that there is no better rule relating to interpretation of statutes than that any statute that is passed which is contrary to any existing law repeals that law by implication; and consequently I take it for granted that the enactment of this law in this appropriation bill and other appropriation bills repeals by implication any other law to the contrary

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me, I will state what I understand the law has been. I understand the law, before this provision was originally put in one of the appropriation bills, was that each examining surgeon should receive $2 for every man that he examined; but a number of years ago the provision was put in the general pension appropriation bill that is there to-day, providing that the examining surgeon shall receive $2 for the first 5 men examined that day, and for the subsequent ones $1, up to 20, while the law before the enactment of this legislation, as it is to-day, was that all should receive $2; but when this provision was first put in the pension bill it repealed the provision in the Revised Statutes, and this became a law.

Mr. BARNEY. That is right.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. And is the existing law to-day.
Mr. BARNEY. That is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because it is put back into this bill and reenacted does not prevent it being the law, because if it is not the law to-day, then all the gentleman from Kansas has to do is to raise the point of order that the provision in the bill would change existing law. If it is already the law, the gentleman from Kansas knows that he can not do that, because it has been reenacted year after year in the pension appropriation bill and is the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman as to whether the existing law was limited to that appropriation or was general in its character, and would continue in force in the absence of general legislation as to future appropriations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, the Revised Statutes of the United States provided that an examining surgeon should receive $2 for every man whom he examined; but a number of years ago—I do not remember how many—that law was changed by enacting the provision that is now in this bill on a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In what Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not state the number of the Conress. The reenactment of it every year does not change the act. It was the law here it shows that fact.

and the reenactment does not change that fact.

Mr. BARNEY. I take it, Mr. Chairman, upon the question which has been proposed by the Chair, that we are to determine by the language of the law what its meaning is and to what it applies; and unless there is something in the law to indicate that it applies to the particular appropriation, it must be taken as a general law. The law before the enactment of this statute provided for the payment of $2 for the examination of each pensioner, and the provision in this and other pension appropriation bills is an amendment to that law.

The CHAIRMAN. What the Chair is trying to get at is, If this is a general law, why is it put in the bill? And if it is not the law, then it changes existing law.

Mr. BARNEY. There was no need of putting it in this bill. This law, as it has occurred in the appropriation bill, is the existing law without reenacting it in this statute, and is only put in here for the purpose of calling particular attention to this change.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me a question?

Mr. BARNEY. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. Has it been the custom of the Pension Mr. VANDIVER. Has it been the custom of the Pension Bureau to be guided by a similar provision to this?

Mr. BARNEY. Yes; it has followed the law.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then it seems to me it is the law.

Mr. BARNEY. It seems to me there is no question about that.

I think it is not necessary in this bill, and I do not think it is subject to a point of order, because it does not change existing law. Much of our most important, and, at the same time, permanent, legislation has been enacted upon appropriation bills. Unless the language of the bill clearly shows that it is only applicable to the particular appropriation, it will be regarded as general legislation, just the same as if it had occurred upon any other measure passed by Congress.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I find, upon examination of the pension appropriation bills for a number of years back, that they have all contained this particular provision as to the payment of examining surgeons. They all contain the same phraseology, to which I invite the attention of the Chair. I read from the former statutes, as follows:

The following sums be, and the same are, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902.

And the previous bill says:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

And so on, each appropriation limited to one year.

This provision is in the nature of a limitation that runs for only a year and is not a permanent law. The result is that each Congress reenacts this provision in the nature of a limitation upon this particular appropriation. So that this provision, which was passed by the last Congress, expires on the 30th of June, 1902, and is a limitation on the appropriation for that year and is not a per-And I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the manent law. And I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that this is the reason why it has been put in all these different annual appropriation bills and why it is in the present bill.

Mr. BARNEY. I can not agree with the position of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gibson]. Take the second paragraph of this bill. It reads:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, for services rendered within the fiscal year $1908,\,$500,000.$

That is an appropriation of the money for the payment of these expenses of examining surgeons for the fiscal year ending 1903. Then the same paragraph goes on and makes provision generally for the compensation of those officers. There is nothing in the language to indicate that the provision is applicable alone to the fiscal year 1903. It has reference to a general law relating to the fees and expenses of examining surgeons. It seems to me that it can not be said with any reason that the general law has application only to the appropriation for the fiscal year 1903.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. The general law on this subject is contained in a general statute which as I stated is the original act of July 14, 1862, amended by the act of March 3, 1873. That stands to-day as the law. It is under that section that the Commissioner of Pensions is empowered to appoint civil surgeons to make medical examinations. It is under that section that the original fee of $2 was prescribed for making these examinations. Afterwards in the act of 1882, it was provided that there should be three of these surgeons upon each of these examining boards; and from that time to this, or from the act of 1885, this limitation has been made, and it has been made by a rider on an appropriation bill; and as the gentleman from Tennessee has suggested, every one of these riders expected. those riders expired when the appropriation ran out.

For that reason new legislation was necessary every time; and whenever this legislation was adopted it was a change of existing whenever this legislation was adopted it was a change of existing law. There is no repeal, even by implication, of the authority of the Commissioner to appoint these boards. No statute has ever made such repeal. Yet if the interpretation of the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct, if there has been, as he contends, a repeal of the original section by implication, then there is no authority for the Commissioner to appoint any of these boards. I say that this clause in the pending bill, like similar clauses in previous bills, is not there for the nurroes of changing existing law.

say that this clause in the pending bill, he similar clauses in previous bills, is put there for the purpose of changing existing law, and it carries with it an appropriation in violation of the rule.

Mr. BARNEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if this were not existing law the Commissioner of Pensions would not have the power to appoint any board of examiners at all? There is not a word here in reference to the manner in which they shall be appointed.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. What I say is that if this repeals existing law, then it repeals the power of the Commissioner to appoint.

Mr. BARNEY. There is not anything here which says a word about the manner in which these officers shall be appointed. The provision relates only to the amount of their fees; that and nothing more.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. The original statute, which directs the Commissioner to appoint these boards and directs how they shall be instructed and paid, is all of it so united that a part can not be repealed by implication.

Mr. BARNEY. Does the gentleman pretend to say that where a statute repeals a prior one by implication, it necessarily repeals all of the statute? Or does it repeal only the part with which it not as applicable to this case, because neither of these laws is dependent on the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has examined the last general appropriation bill and is informed that several previous appropriation bills are in the same form. It is sufficient, however, for us to go back to the last appropriation bill, which is in the exact language of the present bill, and which appropriates a given sum of money to be paid out as now authorized by law, and then unnecessarily recites what the law in fact now is. It copies the existing law verbatim; it neither enlarges nor amends it. Therefore it is immaterial whether this provision is in the bill or out of it. It is existing law, and is not affected by this bill, because the language is copied word for word from the existing law.

The proposed amendment would change existing law, and would do so to the same extent whether that law were quoted in the bill or omitted. The bill does not change existing law; the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas proposes to make such a change, and is, therefore, subject to a point of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. I desire to have read the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to a ruling upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled upon it.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. I think my point was entirely overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the Chair did not rule in direct terms upon the gentleman's point of order, but the Chair stated that the bill itself does not propose to change existing law. It merely copies the language of the existing law without changing or modifying it, while the amendment of the gentleman did propose to change existing law.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. The Chair will pardon me a moment. I submit that the provision in regard to the fee of $2 is only put into the bill for the purpose of prescribing what the spiritude law is. It is, not for the purpose of asserting what the writing law is. It is not for the purpose of asserting what the existing law is. very evident from any fair reading of the bill that such is the fact

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I can be heard for a moment, I desire to explain the import of the amendment I have offered

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to offer the amendment now that he offered a while ago? The CHAIRMAN.

Mr. VANDIVER. I do. Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let that amendment be read again. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at the end of line 6, page 2, the following:
"Provided further, That all soldiers of the various State troops, home guards, and State militia who rendered service—ninety days or more—in said organizations for the maintenance of the Union and suppression of the rebellion in the war of 1861 to 1865 shall be entitled to the same privileges and benefits under the act of June 27, 1890, as other United States troops."

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. VANDIVER. I ask the gentleman to withhold the point of order for a few moments, so as to enable me to explain the scope and object of the amendment.

Mr. BARNEY. I will do that for a moment. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, a word in explanation of the amendment which I have offered. I know that in some of the States of the Union during our late civil war, and I may make special reference to the State of Missouri, the State organized a militia home guard which performed valuable services for the Government, services that would have required the presence and operation of the forces of the United States Government to take their places, or, in other words, these home organizations took the place of the National Government's forces, and in so doing rendered valuable service to the Government, so valuable, in fact, that although some were paid out of the treasury of the State, years afterwards the United States Government reimbursed the State for the payment of that service.

State for the payment of that service.

These soldiers rendered, Mr. Chairman, as good and valiant service in the cause of the Union as many of those who were enlisted in the regiments of the General Government and who went into the service to be sent beyond the limits of the State.

I ask you, then, in all justice and propriety, why you should undertake to deprive them of like privileges and like benefits, when they rendered a similar service? I know that in many instances the General Government paid them for a portion of their service, even at the time; and other portions, as I stated before, were reimbursed to the States and went into the treasuries of the States years afterwards, and yet under the pension laws. is inconsistent? I contend it repeals only the part of the statute with which it is inconsistent.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. It repeals the part with which it is inconsistent, and also the part which depends upon it.

Mr. BARNEY. Oh, no; that is not the rule at all. At least of the statute of their service, even at the time; and other portions, as I stated before, were reimbursed to the States and went into the treasuries of the States years afterwards; and yet, under the pension laws and regulations, these soldiers are deprived of the benefits of the

Now, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. Barney] if, in the generosity of his heart, he is not willing to grant to these soldiers the same privileges claimed and allowed to other soldiers of the Government? I am sorry that he has rushed with such hot haste to make the point of order against my amendment and seems determined still to make pensions impossible to soldiers who served under such circumstances, and I hope that on consideration he will not be willing to put himself forward in opposition to a proposition to do justice to these men who rendered faithful and efficient service in the State organizations during that war.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who speak from long-standing prejudice on this subject, because in my boyhood days I was one of those who, in my State, sympathized with the other side; and every drop of blood in my youthful veins would have been sacrificed at the call of the Confederacy if I had been a few years older and entertained the sentiments I then entertained, and, as a consequence, might not be here now. I have no namby-pamby sentimentalism about it. I confess frankly that my sentiments at that time were with the other side; and yet, at the same time, I am one of those who, notwithstanding those sentiments, have been amongst the first to exhibit devotion to the gallant soldiers who wore the blue and who gave their lives on the battlefields of that war.

I cherish with pride the memory of the heroes of the Southern Confederacy, but at the same time I believe that the most ample justice should be shown to the men who fought for the suppression of the rebellion. And for one, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to say that while I was one who occupied the position I then occupied, I am glad that the Union was preserved and slavery abolished, and am glad that the Union was preserved and slavery abolished, and I cherish gladly the day when the men of the South and the men of the North—those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray—after the war was over went forth hand in hand to build up our common country, while we cherish the affection that their patriotism called forth in every part of the world. Is it not true, sir, that the red and the white rose are together entwined in the crown of England's history? Then may the blue and the gray mingle their colors in absolute harmony in the future glory of our Republic. [Applause] [Applause.]

I hope the time is not far distant when that result may be obtained, and I shall hope to live to see its completion.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if it is not a fact that in the Spanish-American war we united, and are not a fact that in the Spanish-American war we united, and are we not to-day a united country?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; we did.

Mr. PRINCE. Then why not consider that question as settled?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; and in that war as in every other war the men of the South joined shoulder to shoulder with the men of the North in preserving the glory of their common country, and the North in preserving the glory of their common country, and I am glad that the gentleman recognizes the fact and seems to be glad that such was the case.

Mr. BARNEY. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

[Mr. SIMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire permission to extend in the RECORD the few remarks which I have made on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
Mr. GIBSON. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BARNEY], chairman of this subcommittee, will make that request

Mr. BARNEY. I have already submitted that request in the committee, but the Chairman suggested that it should be made in

Mr. BOREING. Mr. Chairman, the action of Congress by which these liberal appropriations are made for the payment of pensions is responsive to the public sentiment of the people. From the begin-ning of this Government the citizen soldier has been relied upon by the country for its defense whenever the rights of citizens and the the country for its defense whenever the rights of citizens and the liberties of the people have been imperiled in war, foreign or domestic. Congress has long since learned that the country will never lack for defenders as long as it takes care of the men who have fought its battles, which is infinitely cheaper than the maintenance of a large army in times of peace. It is therefore the settled policy of the American Republic to provide for liberal pensions for its disabled soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphans.

But Mr. Chairman, as has been correctly stated during the

But, Mr. Chairman, as has been correctly stated during the progress of this debate by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gibson], there is one class of the soldiers of the civil war not provided for in the pending bill. That class is designated by him as the "irregular soldiers," or the State troops in the border States, especially in Kentucky and Missouri. These troops were enlisted by the authority of the United States, but organized, armed, equipped, and paid by the States. There were a number of battalions recruited in Kentucky by the State and placed at the disposal of the General Government. These several battalions took orders from the commanding generals of the Federal Army; were oftentimes ordered out of the State. They guarded railroads and bridges and wagon trains. Like other soldiers, they went into battle and fought side by side with the United States Volunteers and Regulars. Like other soldiers they were killed and wounded and Regulars. Like other soldiers, they were killed and wounded in battle. Like other soldiers, they contracted disease by reason of the exposure incidental to soldier life; and like other soldiers, they are entitled to recognition by the General Government and to such pensions as are provided for other soldiers.

It is true that these troops were enlisted and equipped and paid by the States, but afterwards, recognizing the services of these courageous and patriotic soldiers, the General Government reimbursed the State of Kentucky for its expenditure in behalf of these troops, and, as I am informed, for some time after the close of the civil war they were pensioned as other soldiers, until some time in the seventies, when a rule was promulgated in the Pen-sion Bureau drawing the line on muster into the United States service. Since that time these men and their widows and orphans have been denied pensions under the general laws; consequently they have been knocking at the doors of Congress for special acts for pensions for the last quarter of a century. For the benefit and relief of these Kentucky battalions I have intro-duced H. R. 2168, which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2168) granting pension to certain battalions of Kentucky State militia.

Be it enacted, etc.. That the provisions of existing pension laws be, and they hereby are, extended to the officers and men of the organizations of Kentucky militia designated as follows, namely, Frankfort Battalion, Paducah Battalion, Sandy Valley Battalion (known as the Capital Guards), the North Cumberland Battalion, Three Forks Battalion, Harlan County Battalion, South Cumberland Battalion, First Kentucky Cavalry, Casey County State Guards, Frankfort Battalion, and Captain Bussey's Bath County Rangers, disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty while such militia was cooperating with the United States forces, and to the widows, minor children under 16 years of age, and dependent parents of such officers and men: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to determine, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, when and for what periods, if any, each or any of the organizations named herein were thus cooperating with the United States forces: And provided further, That pensions under this act shall commence from the date of filing the application after the passage of this act.

Now. Mr. Chairman, the researce of this interior is hereby authorized and empowered to determine, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, when and for what periods, if any, each or any of the organizations named herein were thus cooperating with the United States forces: And provided further, That pensions under this act shall commence from the date of filing the application after the passage of this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill will not throw open the flood gates to any large number of pensioners, because a great many of these soldiers, after the expiration of their terms of service as State troops, enlisted in other regiments and were mustered into the United States service, by reason of which they have acquired a pensionable status under existing laws. Others were pensioned before the present rulings of the Department obtained, and many others have died and have joined their comrades around pensioned before the present rulings of the Department obtained, and many others have died and have joined their comrades around the camp fires on the other shore. I appeal to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to consider and report this bill at an early date; I appeal to the House as a matter of sheer justice to patriotic citizens and soldiers of intelligent courage to pass the bill, and the whole country, North, South, East, and West, will approve your action. The people of the South to-day are as loyal to the flag as the people of the North. It was the best blood on both sides that was poured out in the civil war. The South was in error, but her people have seized every opportunity afforded them since the close of the irrepressible conflict to prove their loyalty to the Union. The ex-Confederate soldier joined the ex-Federal soldier in planting the American flag in the Philippine Islands, from which neither is in favor of seceding.

There is another class of soldiers denied pensions under existing law whose rights and interests ought to be considered and provided for in these appropriations. That class of men who were conscripted, or by reason of circumstances were forced into the conscripted, or by reason of circumstances were forced into the Confederate Army in the beginning of the war, but when oppor-tunity was afforded them left the Confederate service and enlisted in the Federal Army and served faithfully for a term of three years and received an honorable discharge. I recall some instances of this class which fell under my observation during the progress of the war. One or two of that class enlisted and served in the same company and regiment to which I belonged. The courage, patriotism, and loyalty of these men were never questioned. I maintain that their loyal and efficient service to the Government of the United States and their honorable discharges from the same should wipe out all taint of disloyalty attached by reason of their former service in the Confederate Army, and to that end I have introduced H. R. 2074, which is pending before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and reads as follows: A bill (H. R. 2074) limiting the application of section 4716, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to claims for pension arising under sections 2 and 3 of an act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents: "Provided, That the service on account of which pension has been or may hereafter be claimed was voluntarily and unconditionally entered into by the soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 1st day of January, 1865; and nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to any claim for pension based upon an application filed prior to the date of its superoval

There is one other class of soldiers to which I desire in this connection to call the attention of Congress, and that is that class of soldiers that enlisted in one regiment and for one cause and another, or by reason of circumstances, separated or left the regiment in which they first enlisted without a discharge, but subsequently enlisted in another regiment and served the regular term and received an honorable discharge from their reenlistment. This class of soldiers under existing law have a pensionable status, provided that not more than four months elapsed from the date of leaving the first regiment before their reenlistment in the second, but if four months and a day has elapsed, they are denied pensions. For the benefit of this class of claimants I have introduced H. R. 2075, which is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs, and reads as follows, viz:

A bill (H. R. 2075) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain volunteer and regular soldiers of the late war and the war with Mexico," approved March 2, 1889.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain volunteer and regular soldiers of the late war and the war with Mexico," approved March 2, 1889, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read:

Mexico," approved March 2, 1889, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read:

"Sec. 3. That the charge of desertion now standing on the rolls and records in the office of Adjutant-General of the Army against any regular or volunteer soldier who served in the late war of the rebellion by reason of his having enlisted in any regiment, troop, or company, or in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, without having first received a discharge from the regiment, troop, or company in which he had previously served shall be removed in all cases wherein it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, from such rolls and records, or from other satisfactory testimony, that such reenlistment was not made for the purpose of securing bounty or other gratuity that he would not have been entitled to had he remained under his original term of enlistment, and that such soldier served faithfully under his reenlistment and received an honorable discharge therefrom."

The purpose of this bill is to remove the limitation of four months and to provide that if the soldier subsequently reenlisted and served faithfully under his reenlistment and obtained an honorable discharge therefrom he shall be given a pensionable status.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the passage of these three bills, all of which, in my judgment, are meritorious, will tend to relieve Congress of a good per cent of the bills for special-act pensions now piled up before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, never to be considered by that committee.

Before concluding these remarks, I want to invite attention to H. R. 6567, providing for the establishment of a court of pension appeals for the relief of claimants and Congress, and for other purposes, which reads as follows:

appeals for the relief of claimants and Congress, and for other purposes, which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6567) to establish a court of pension appeals to relieve pension claimants and Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created and established a court of pension appeals for the hearing, examination, and adjudication of cases founded upon or arising under the pension laws of the United States, which shall consist of seven judges, of whom four shall constitute a quorum, which shall be a court of record, having a clerk and a seal, with only appellate jurisdiction as hereinafter defined and limited, she name of said court being the "Court of pension appeals of the United States."

SEC. 2. That a term of said court shall be held annually at the city of Washington, D. C., commencing on the first Monday in September and continuing as long as may be necessary for the disposal of the business of the court. The judges of said court shall be persons learned in the law, appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, one of whom shall, in the original organization of the court, be designated by the President as chief justice, and afterwards so designated according to seniority of commission; and not more than five of the members of said court shall be appointed from the same political party. Each member of said court, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to faithfully discharge his duties.

SEC. 3. That each member of said court shall hold office during good behavior and be entitled to the same compensation as the judges of the Court of Claims of the United States, and payable in the same manner as the judges of said court.

SEC. 4. That said court shall have power to establish all rules and regulations for the conduct of its business, for the regulation of practice therein, and for the taking of appeals thereto; but it shall be necessary, in cases brough lations of the court, and receive the same salaries as are now provided for the balliff, messenger, cierk, and assistant clerk of the Court of Claims of the Since. That each of the judges of the said court shall have a secretary at an annual salary of $2.00, and the court shall have one official stenographer at an annual salary of $2.00, out of which he shall provide all his own assistance; and the said secretaries and stenographer shall be appointed by the Since and the said secretaries and stenographer shall be appointed by the Since and the said secretaries and stenographer shall be appointed by the Since and the said secretaries and stenographer shall be appointed by the Since and the said secretaries and stenographer shall be appointed by the Commissioner shall claims for pensions, increase of pensions, for restoration to the pension roll, and for arrears of pension arising under the laws of the United States, which do not come within any pension in ward can not be adjudicated and allowed by the Commissioner of Pensions; and the decision of said court upon any and all pension claims shall be binding upon the said Commissioner shall an experiment of the said court shall all pension the said commissioner of the said court in the said court, and they shall be entered on the docket of said court and in the order in which they are received.

Sec. 19. That all applications for pensions, arrears of pension, and for restoration to the pension roll, together with all

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the merits of this bill at this time, but I desire in this connection to call attention to the necessity of the passage of such a bill. Our pension system has grown up, as has our Government, from a small beginning. Our pension legislation has been by piecemeal, and our pension system is therefore lacking in systematic methods and permanent rulings for its government, and I suppose I commit no error in saying that all the Departments of the Government in Washington are governed by rulings, all of which do not always keep within the scope of the provisions of the acts of Congress.

The rulings of the Pension Bureau are oftentimes changed with the change of executive administration; for instance, the rule promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior under the Harrison Administration construing the act of June 27, 1890, was radically different from the rule promulgated by his successor construing the same act of Congress. So different were these constructions that thousands of soldiers pensioned under the former construction lost their pensions or had them reduced under the construction lost their pensions of had them reduced under the construction of the latter. Now, it seems to me that a court of pension appeals, composed of lawyers, and not clerks and doctors, like the board of appeals that now exists in the Interior Department, who are able to construe law, understand the relation of law and facts and relation of fact to fact, will be of inestimable value in establishing permanent and fixed rullings for the widers of the Commission of Pensions and will in the fact. guidance of the Commissioner of Pensions and will insure a fair the present board of appeals of the Interior Department is objectionable, because it is not necessarily composed of lawyers and because it is not independent of the Pension Bureau. In the very nature of things, it can not be. It owes its existence to the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions. The Secretary of the Interior is the superior officer of the Commissioner of Pensions. This board of appeals is the offspring, or has come out of, the Pension Bureau and the Interior Departhas come out of, the Pension Bureau and the Interior Department. However fair or unfair they may be I am not prepared to say, but assuming, as I do, that they may be fair—and I have no doubt they are from their standpoint—but the claimants have an impression, that is shared in by the public in general, that the conclusions reached are not always fair, because of the varied and varying rulings that govern them. It has been stated on the floor of the House, and not denied in this debate, that widows and or hans are required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that and orphans are required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the deceased soldier on whose account pension is claimed was a sound, able-bodied man before he entered the service of the United States. Perhaps neither the widow nor the children of deceased soldier has any means of knowing or finding out about the habits or the health of the husband and ancestor before his enlistment.

I maintain that the Government requiring the soldier to take a test examination before a surgeon of the Army, or a board of surgeons, as to his physical condition, and this surgeon or board of surgeons having pronounced him sound and able-bodied, and the Government having accepted his service, the presumption is in favor of the claimant, and it should devolve upon the Government to prove, by a preponderance of testimony, that the ancestor was not a sound and able-bodied man at the time he entered the service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has come when we need an independent court, whose opinion will not be swayed by politics, by the Government, or by the claimants, who will not only from time to time construe the acts of Congress, but shall have power to codify the pension laws and make recommendations from time to time to Congress respecting legislation. I am thoroughly convinced that if all four of these bills are passed, such action will tend greatly to relieve Congress of the immense bur-den that it has invited by hearing cases that should have gone first to a fair, impartial, capable court, and that only such cases should come to Congress as are cut out or denied by technicalities of law which work a hardship on the claimant.

The business of Congress is to enact law—to enact, not primarily to construe and execute law; and I belive every member of this House will agree with me that Congress must have relief from this class of business that does not belong here.

In view of the citation, Livite executed attention of Congress.

In view of the situation, I invite especial attention of Congress to the bill that I have offered in the hope that the committee will report favorably upon it, or report a bill of this import, that will do justice to the warriors of the generations of the past and the present whose services have made the country what it is to-day. When this is done you will have satisfied the demands of public opinion and the public sentiment of the American people.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BARNEY, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying just a word in conclusion in reference to this bill.

I do not want any man on this floor, I do not care upon which side he is, to put me in the attitude here of being in any way opposed to the old Union soldier. It seems to me that some memposed to the old Union soldier. It seems to me that some members of this body have attempted in some way, in the discussion of this bill and in offering amendments, to do that. I regard this as unjust and unfair, as the old Union soldier has no better friend than I on the floor of this House. This is simply a bill appropriating for pensions under existing law. It has nothing whatever to do with the creation of law relating to pensions or any amendments of such laws. The rules of this House have wisely provided that the Committee on Appropriations of which I am vided that the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member, and which has reported this bill, is prohibited from attaching anything to any of its bills which changes existing law. No rule is better understood or more jealously guarded by every member of this House than that rule.

Members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions have come in here and offered an amendment to this bill, the consideration of which amendments belongs to their committee and no other committee in this House. All measures relating to the pension laws go to that committee. Then, I ask, why should gentlemen be so vigorous in proposing amendments to this bill, when they know they are not in order, when they know they do not belong on Why have they not gone to the Committee on Pensions, which has jurisdiction of these matters, and there made their applications and there pressed their measures in behalf of the Union soldier? I was glad to hear from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Norton] that he proposed, before he got through with this Congress, to go before that committee and press some of these measures which he favors.

A MEMBER. He is a member of that committee.

Mr. BARNEY. He is a member of that committee. That makes it all the better, for he can do his talking for the old soldier before his own committee and where it belongs. I am tired of hearing members of the Invalid Pensions Committee get up here on the floor when this bill is before the House and criticise the Appropriations Committee and ask for amendments upon this bill which they know are not germane to it. They are members of the proper committee to originate and formulate that kind of legislation, and it is their duty as members of that committee to bring in legislation of that character before this House and ask for its consideration in behalf of the old soldier if they are honestly in favor of it.

If I understand these proposed amendments correctly, I am in favor of them all, but they have no place on this bill; and the gentlemen who have moved them know it, or at least ought to know it.

I say to you, if you are in earnest in desiring this kind of legislation, introduce your bill to that effect in the regular way; get it out of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which has jurisdiction of it, and then, when it comes before the House in the regular way, exploit your enthusiasm for the old soldier at a time when it can do him some good. I will gladly support you then with my voice and my vote. Until you have done that you have no right to try to force such legislation upon a bill contrary to the rules of this House.

Moreover, such legislation ought to be carefully considered in the committee where it belongs to the end that when it comes before the House it will be in proper form to fill the purpose for which it was designed. In short, if you are going to do anything for the old soldiers do it in the proper way and in such shape that it will amount to something.

Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise and report this bill to the House with the recommendation that the same do

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] for a formal amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin

[Mr. Barney] to withhold his motion for a moment. I desire to move to strike out the last word for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity to make a few suggestions.

Mr. BARNEY. Then I move that debate upon the bill and amendments be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this, as I understand, is simply the annual appropriation bill to make provision for the payment of the pensions granted to the old soldiers for the next fiscal year. But very few amendments can be offered to this bill which would be proper under our rules, and when gentlemen attempt to correct irregularities in our general pension laws by attempt to correct irregularities in our general pension laws by amending a general appropriation bill, in my judgment they are doing that which we ought not to attempt to do. I for one am as strongly in favor of liberal pension laws for the old soldiers' benefit as any man that served during the war from 1861 to 1865, and yet I know that we can not correct irregularities by amending general appropriation bills.

I have thought for years, and feel to-day, that our laws ought to be revised and amended, but the way to amend such laws is to bring the matter before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and let that committee bring in a general revision of our pension laws, and try by that means to do justice to the old soldiers, and not make the pension appropriation bill a pack horse at every meeting of Congress for the purpose of making windy talks for home consumption and for the benefit of constituents. in work and action rather than in talk, and have refrained during the twelve years I have been here from making many remarks in the twelve years I have been here from making many remarks in reference to these matters. I will sanction and support any proposition or resolution which any gentleman may offer which will call upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions to bring into this House, say at the next session, or at the first session of the next Congress, a general revision of our pension laws. God Almighty knows they need it.

We have been patching up the pension laws ever since the close of the war, and it is a patchwork—a crazy quilt, we may call it—to-day, and what we want more than anything else, in my judgment, is a general revision of the laws, after careful and painstaking consideration, and let justice be done the survivors of the war.

I am sorry that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, my colleague, was not old enough at the close of the war to be able to be reconstructed. Why, all the old Confederates who served during the civil war on his side of the House never indulge in such expressions as he has uttered here.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I have not time to answer questions; I have only five minutes.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Not now. I only hope that with advancing age the gentleman may finally be reconstructed. His colleagues on that side of the House who went out and fought to support their cause have laid down their arms and have been marshaled under the Stars and Stripes for many years, and in the Spanish-American war and down in the Philippines and over in China their sons have fallen beside the sons of the Northern sol-With the fighting men of the South distinctions have been dier. With the ignting men of the South distinctions have been wiped out, and it is only with the younger generation that the old rebellious feeling still exists. I hope you have heard of that—
Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman has made a statement about my remarks which I challenge as to the facts, I ask him to repeat the words that he refers to.
Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The only way to remedy this condition

Mr. VANDIVER. Does the gentleman refuse?
Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I can not yield. [Continuing:] The Committee on Invalid Pensions to have an opportunity to bring in a general revision of the pension laws, and when that is reported we can take up all of these questions and try and make the law what it ought to be. [Loud applause.]

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the bill.
Mr. BARNEY. How much time does the gentleman want-

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a few minutes. The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the committee for debate on the bill has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may be allowed two minutes. Several Members. Make it five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks that the gentleman from Missouri shall be allowed two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected, after the liberal amendment I had offered seeking to provide additional privileges for the benefit of the Union soldier, to hear any gentleman on the other side of the House make any insinuation that I needed to be reconstructed. The gentleman from Illinois has not dared to quote my words which he criticises and seeks to distort. I have challenged him to quote one word from me which he can use to give color to such an insinuation. But after making his cowardly thrust he sits down and sullenly refuses to answer my question. question.

I resent the insinuation, because the gentleman can not find a word in my remarks to justify the cowardly insinuation that he has made. Mr. Chairman, I did say that in my boyhood I sympathized with the Southern Confederacy, and I shall not take it back. I did say, furthermore, that I was glad that the results of the civil war had turned out as they did and that the union of these States had been preserved. I say now that there is not a man on this floor having a more friendly feeling to the old soldier than I have. There is not a man on this floor that has tried to than I have. There is not a man on this floor that has tried to do more for the old soldier than I have since I have been here, and I am exceedingly surprised at the gentleman from Illinois seeking to make capital out of false charges and saying in his speech that I need to be reconstructed. If he were the friend of the soldier that he professes to be he would support my amendment.

I want to tell the gentleman from Illinois when he says that speeches are made here for home consumption that if he is as equal to the emergency in making speeches of statesmanship as he is in making speeches for home consumption he ought to return here for another twelve years, but that if his ingenuity in making false charges and insinuations is always to be kept up to the present height, then he ought not to stay here twelve seconds longer. Let him go 'way back and sit down. [Laughter; applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8581) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and had directed that the same be reported back without amendment with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the pending bill to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed was read the third time and passed.
On motion of Mr. BARNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next. The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all members of the House be allowed ten days in which to print remarks on the pension appropriation bill.

marks on the pension appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for leave to print for ten days on the pension appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that that is to be confined to pension legislation, or a discussion of the bill?

Mr. BARNEY. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am opposed, Mr. Speaker, to general leave to print on any question.

leave to print on any question.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions:

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the report of the Committee on Accounts went over to this session, and the gentleman from Missouri now calls it up. The Clerk will read the resolution again.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Chair to have the resolutions separated, and desire to know if this is the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Let the resolution be reported first.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That members of the House of Representatives who are chairmen of committees entitled to annual clerks, excepting the Committee on Elections No. 1, shall be entitled to the same allowance for clerk hire during the sessions of Congress as is authorized by law to other members of the House who are not chairmen of committees; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to make payment hereunder, out of the contingent fund of the House, in the manner provided in the joint resolution approved March 3, 1833, until provision is made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, or otherwise by law, to carry out the purposes of this resolution:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Bart-LETT] demands a division upon these propositions. Does he desire a separate vote on each? If not, will he indicate those on which he asks a separate vote?

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire a separate vote upon the question with reference to the clerks. I want to separate that from these other propositions. The first branch of the resolution ought not to be loaded down with these other matters.

The SPEAKER. There are seven propositions in this resolution. Although the word "resolved" is not at the beginning of every proposition it will be understood to be there. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to ask a separate vote on the first proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. The proposition with reference to allowing clerks to committees at $100 a month.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report resolution numbered 2.

The second paragraph of the resolution was again read. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this proposition.

Mr. HIILL. I desire to offer an amendment to the first resolution. Should that come in now or after the vote is taken upon the next resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Joy] is in charge of the bill and has the floor.

Mr. HULL. I have no amendment to the proposition just read, but I desire to offer one to the first paragraph.

Mr. JOY. I think the gentleman's amendment, which he has submitted to me, should come in after the first paragraph. I shall not object to his proposing the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will send up his amendment

Mr. HULL. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield for Mr. JOY. I do.

The amendment of Mr. HULL was read, as follows:

Insert the following as paragraphs 2 and 3:

"2. In addition to the above, the chairmen of the Committees en Military Affairs and Naval Affairs are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to said committees, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress at the rate of $6 per diem each.

"3. That the chairmen of the Committees on the Judiciary, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, District of Columbia, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Accounts, Indian Affairs, Public Buildings and Grounds, and Insular Affairs are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to said committees, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House during the session of the Fifty-seventh Congress at the rate of $6 per diem each: Provided, That the chairmen of said committees in paragraph 3 shall not be entitled to any allowance for clerk hire during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman for an explanation

Mr. HULL. So far as this amendment applies to the Committee on Military Affairs, I can say upon my personal judgment and knowledge that it is necessary for the good of the public service. That committee has before it to-day 1,700 bills, and from the day that this Congress met to the present time we have had an extra clerk at the desk registering these bills, docketing them, and getting them ready for action by the subcommittees and answering questions of members. It will be utterly impossible for the Committee on Military Affairs to control its business and meet the demands of members of the House unless we have a session clerk.

So far as concerns the other branch of the resolution, proposing a clerk for the chairman of the committee, I will simply say that neither the annual clerk nor the session clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs has ever been able during the sessions of the House to discharge any duties as a personal clerk to the chairman since I have occupied that position. The personal clerk of the chairman has been paid out of personal funds during the whole of the time I have been chairman. A part of the money has been paid by the assistant clerk and a part of it by the chairman himself. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who is here to speak for himself, insists that he can not properly distional clerk be provided for his committee unless this additional clerk be provided for his committee, to be paid for either by the House or out of the chairman's own pocket.

As to the other committees referred to the committee of the committees referred to the committee of th the chairmen of the committees interested have said to me that if they had a session clerk it would be ample for their needs. For that reason the resolution has been drawn as it is.

wish to say to gentlemen of the House that the Committee on Military Affairs has more personal contact with members and serves more of them than any committee of Congress, except the Committee on Invalid Pensions. In the last Congress we had about 3,000 bills before us. This year, out of the total number thus far introduced, we have already, as I have said, over 1,700. The chairman of the committee receives letters that ought to be answered relating to military parks, desertions, battlefields, everything coming within the jurisdiction of the committee from every State of the Union.

I have been willing heretofore to pay in large part for the employment of a personal clerk out of my own pocket. I am willing to do so still if this House says that I ought to do it. But I do say to gentlemen of the House that no matter who may be chairman in the future, so long as the committee has its vast volume of business and its vast correspondence requiring the services of one of the clerks of that committee during the entire session, for private bills the committee should have what is asked for in this resolution. I believe that the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Ways and Means, and the other committees having large clerical help need that help.

I am willing to take the word of any committee of this House as to what is absolutely necessary for the transaction of the public business. I believe that if members of the House will consult members of the Military Committee, both on the majority and minority side, they will find that there is no difference of opinion among the members of the committee as to the fact that we need everything we ask for in this amendment. I submit the question to the judgment of the House.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to say simply that I heartily concur in all that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has said so far as the Committee on Military Affairs is concerned, and I hope there will be no objection to his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed to this paragraph by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be

Mr. KAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard briefly on this.
Mr. JOY. How much time does the gentleman want?
Mr. RAY of New York. Only a minute or two.
Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman for a few minutes.
Mr. RAY of New York. My purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, was to offer an amendment to the amendment. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], as I supposed, had been agreed upon, but it seems the one sent to the desk, and which has been read for the information of the House, is different from my understanding of what it was to be.

Now, I propose to insert the words "the Committee on the Judiciary" in that paragraph after the words "Naval Affair"

I think it follows properly in that order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

In paragraph 2, after the words "Naval Affairs," insert the words "the Committee on the Judiciary;" and strike out the words "the Committee on the Judiciary" from the third paragraph of the resolution.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say this to the members of the House:

The Committee on the Judiciary has a large number of bills before it, and has a vast amount of work to accomplish, as every member of the committee can attest. In the last Congress we had the regular clerk of the committee, and an assistant clerk at $6 per day, who was an experienced stenographer, and in addition to that I had to hire on two different occasions, and pay out of my own pocket, additional clerical assistance for the committee. or otherwise our work could not have been done. In the present Congress we have more work, much more work, than we had in that Congress, and it is only fair and proper that the chairmen of these committees should be absolutely relieved of the necessity and the expense of employing stenographers and clerks to help to transact the business of the committees for the benefit of the House and the country. Certainly, if such assistants are em-ployed the chairmen of the committees ought not to be expected to pay them. Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. SHATTUC. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York that you might relieve the Committee on the Judiciary of very much of its work if that committee would refer to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization the bills that do not belong to the gentleman's committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg to say to the gentleman from Ohio that there are no bills before that committee that do not properly belong there under the rules of the House.

Mr. SHATTUC. I beg the gentleman from New York to allow that question to be decided by the House.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, of course there is no disability on the part of the House of Representatives in dealing with that matter. I can assure the gentleman that the Committee on the Judiciary has no desire to claim any work that belongs properly to the gentleman from Ohio and his committee. We would not consider ourselves capable of dealing with any business that ought to go to that gentleman's committee.

Mr. SHATTUC. You took it just the same, whether you claim it or not.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will call our attention to any business that belongs to his committee, we will gladly surrender it and give up all claim of ability to deal with it.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, for fear I may not be recognized at any other time, I will call attention to the fact that there are bills before the gentleman's committee now for the keeping of anarchists out of this country, and also bills on naturalization. Now, I will take the gentleman at his word and ask him if, without any further contest, he will refer those bills back to the committee that I represent. I ask him if he will do it?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the contleman from Geografie?

the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. RAY of New York. Most certainly.
Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell the House how many bills the Judiciary reported to the House at the last session of Congress? At that time that committee had a clerk and an assistant clerk.

assistant clerk.

Mr. RAY of New York. We reported a large number of bills, and the House passed a large number of the bills that we reported, but the amount of work done by a committee is not always determined by the number of bills that they actually report. Harder work and more work is often done in the consideration of bills that are defeated in the committee, which the committee regard unwise to report, than in the consideration of bills which are actually reported and passed.

Mr. BARTLETT. What part does the clerk or assistant clerk take in defeating bills before the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. RAY of New York. In doing what?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says there was more work done in defeating bills than in reporting bills favorably. I ask what part does the clerk or assistant clerk take in defeating bills? The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAY of New York. I should like just a moment before the question is taken. I ask that I be given a moment.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the Chair to give it.

Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Joy] yield?

Mr. JOY. I do not think there will be opportunity. Quite a number of other amendments are proposed here.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, that is all right.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, that is all right. Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a minute?

Mr. JOY.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I simply want to ask for a division of these two amendments. I ask for a separate vote upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULL].

The SPEAKER. A separate vote will be taken, because the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] is an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. The question is on the amendment to the amendment amendment

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to have a minute. The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missour

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield? Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. JOY. One minute.
Mr. CANNON. I think a minute is all I want. This resolution reported by the Committee on Accounts does a number of things. Amongst others it makes an allowance of a hundred dollars a month for clerk hire to the chairmen of committees that have clerks. Then it goes on and picks out a lot of committees that want an increase of force. In my judgment, while there is much of merit, I think, in the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that his clerk needs an assistant, and while there is much merit in the statement that the Committee on Naval Affairs needs an assistant clerk, and while the same may be true of others without mentioning them, I think some committees are mentioned here that perhaps have not much use for one clerk, let alone an assistant; and if you go further and give an allowance of a hundred dollars a month for the chairmen of committees having clerks, it seems to me you go too far when you allow in some instances assistant clerks, because one ought to prevent the other. Now, I think that judicious selection ought to be made between these different cases. In fact, it seems to me that if this whole matter went back to the Committee on Accounts, and that committee made close inquiry as to why help was really needed, and then if a new resolution were reported back, it would perhaps be well. I think if we employ competent people for clerks to committees, with the exception of two or three committees we have got more help than we now need.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Illinois make a motion to recommit this? I think it is a proper motion.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend has given more attention to it than I have. I wanted to state what seemed to me to be proper action, and I thought it proper to say it at this time. It is perhaps ungracious—at least, it is somewhat embarrassing—where propositions come that look toward the personal comfort or alleged personal comfort of gentlemen, members of the House, to interpose an objection. I wanted to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri who reports this resolution. I did not know that the resolution was pending until called up a few moments ago, and I have not had time to examine it at all.

Mr. JOY. It was printed this morning in the Record.
Mr. CANNON. Unfortunately, being engaged in my committee, I did not know it.

Mr. JOY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.
Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will bear with me perhaps for longer than five minutes if I can not get through in that time. The House might as well know now the situation that confronts the Committee on Accounts. The recommittal of this resolution can do no good. The demands upon the Committee on Accounts and acceding to them, permit me to say by the House for years has grown until last year I think there were 19 tee on Accounts and acceding to them, permit me to say by the House, for years has grown until last year I think there were 12 assistant clerks allowed by this committee and passed upon by the House. This year the demand is made for 16 assistant clerks to committees, at $6 a day.

I question if the Committee on Accounts could have withstood the demand from the floor to allow or to recommend 16 clerks. Now, after allowing 16 clerks it left this condition—every committee in the House having an append clerk had an exciptor or mittee in the House having an annual clerk had an assistant exmittee in the House naving an annual clerk had an assistant except the committees on Territories, on Agriculture, on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and on Foreign Affairs. Now, I assume to say, Mr. Speaker, that these committees have not heretofore been allowed additional clerks because they have not asked for them, and, I further say, because they did not need them. You all know who are chairmen of those committees.

You all know that those committees are appropriation commit-tees of this House, and surely rank fairly well beside many of the committees that have heretofore had assistant clerks at $6 a day. Now, if this resolution is passed, it would include the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads. We have no need for the clerk; but it was the only solution of the matter to include in our recommendation every committee having an annual clerk, that the chairman be permitted to have a clerk, the same as the rest of the members of the House.

Now, four chairmen of the committees of the House have not, and I do not believe ever would, Mr. Speaker, have the effrontery to ask this House to give them assistant clerks; and I may repeat that their committees have need of assistant clerks more than two-thirds of the committees that ask them. Now, one or two of these committees that ask for assistant clerks I am a member of. I know something about their duties. I know that the clerk in the consideration of a bill has no duties to perform. We had a bill before my committee for four months, under constant consideration, that this House passed at its last session. The time that our clerk had to work on that bill did not exceed an hour. And I only speak of the average committee, and every committee

On our appropriation bill, it is true, the clerk has some work to do. When we consider laws or great measures we get the assistants from the departments to advise us and to consult with us and to perform some really clerical work. This measure reported here should dispose of this matter for this Congress at least. This simply gives those committees that had an assistant clerk at $6 a day a clerk at $100 a month and puts them all on the same level. If the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee level. If the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, shall be able hereafter to show to the Committee on Accounts that his committee needs greater assistance than given here, let that matter be considered hereafter. Let the House determine here to-day whether they propose to give to 16 committees of this House, because they have asked for them, clerks at $6 a day, or whether they shall give 21 clerks at $100 a

The Committee on Accounts went over this matter two years ago and in committee agreed upon this very proposition. For certain reasons it was not reported. Then, I believe, there were only 12 requests. Now you have gotten within 4 of the maximum number of committees supplied with clerks, and you will to-day either adopt this resolution giving 21 chairmen an assistant clerk at $100 a month or will in the future adopt a resolution giving 16 chairmen assistant clerks at $6 a day. Now, this is no new matter with the Committee on Accounts. They have gone over it for years before to-day. It is the only solution of this question, and I hope the gentleman from Iowa, understanding the situation as I have presented it, will withdraw his amendment and let that matter come up by itself.

Personally, I will state that if this resolution were adopted to-day, and the resolution were my motion, I would not vote for it, because I do not believe it necessary; but I do believe, Mr.

it, because I do not believe it necessary; but I do believe, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that it is the only solution of this question. I believe that the chairman of a committee in of this question. I believe that the chairman of a committee in the selection of a clerk should get a man who is competent to perform the duties of the position. Often chairmen say, "But my clerk is not a stenographer." In 1902 I say that no man is competent to be the clerk of a committee who is not a stenographer. Now, then, if the chairman of the committee saw fit to select some man who is incompetent it is not the function of this House to allow him assistance and pay for it out of the contingent fund. The adoption of this resolution will save ten or twelve thousand dollars and settle this question for some time, at least dollars and settle this question, for some time, at least.

Mr. HULL. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Ray] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was lost

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr.

HULL) there were 59 ayes and 65 noes.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the first proposition included in the report.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the first proposition, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 3, page 1, by striking out the words "except the Committee on Elections No. 1."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I hope that amendment will be adopted. That amendment puts all the committees of the House upon the same footing.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAYLER of Ohio) there were 98 ayes and 12 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Missouri would yield to me for a moment to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. IOV I will yield.

the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JOY. I will yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I want to insert, after the word "that," in the first line, the words "from and after December 10, 1901." That was the date upon which the committees were appointed and upon which members made chairmen of committees lost their individual clerks. I do not know that I should be compelled to pay more than $100 for clerk hire when that disability is not placed on other members of the House. While I am very proud of the position to which the Speaker appointed me, I do not think my colleagues ought to compel me to pay $100 a month for it. [Laughter.] [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "that," in line 1, insert "from and after December 10, 1901."

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I think that amendment ought to be adopted. It carries back the appointment of the clerks to the date of the appointment of the committees themselves, and it is in line with the view of those who expressed themselves before the committee. It was an oversight in not placing it in the bill originally.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Hep-BURN, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now submit the first paragraph as amended.

The question was taken, and the paragraph was agreed to. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next paragraph. The Clerk read as follows:

(2) That the chairmen of the following-named committees are hereby authorized to appoint clerks to such committees, to serve during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per diem each, to wit: Elections No. 3, Pacific Railroads, Census, Industrial Arts and Expositions, and Examination and Disposition of Documents.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something on this second section.

Mr. JOY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, by the adoption of the first section of this resolution we have given to the chairmen of committees having annual clerks a clerk during the sessions. Now, I believe, having alone that, it does away with the necessity for these session clerks that are to follow. I believe the members ought to take that into consideration. We can not afford to load down the rolls of this House with session clerks at $6 a day. We have given chairmen of committees annual clerks for use during the sessions of Congress, and I hope the members will vote down this second proposition.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I desire to offer an amendment to the second section.

Mr. JOY. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 2 by striking out "Elections No. 3." That committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, was never organized, never will organize during the session, can not have any business before it if it did organize, and there is no necessity for a clerk to that committee. I am satisfied it is here by mistake. I hope that this amendment will be adopted, because there is no necessity for paying a clerk to the Committee on Elections No. 3 when there is practically no such committee, the committee never having been organized, as I have said, and there being no business before it if it should organize.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of Elections Committee No. 3, alluded to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Randall], I wish to say that the committee is organized and subcommittees have been appointed. I have acted thus far as clerk and also as messenger for the committee, doing all the necessary business of the committee. Two very important cases have been referred to that committee, cases which will be bitterly contested, and will involve a great many meetings not only of the committee itself, but of the subcommittee to which the cases have

This committee has heretofore had a clerk. In the Fifty-sixth Congress we had a clerk during the session; and it is just as necessary that we should have a clerk now as it was during the last Congress. I say, in all candor, to the gentleman who makes this motion, that it will be impossible for the chairman of that committee, without the aid of a clerk, to transact properly the business that is now before it and to attend to his duties in this House.

Mr. JOY. With reference to the second paragraph of this resolution, I wish to say that the Committee on Accounts was unanimous in making this recommendation. Undoubtedly these Electory.

mous in making this recommendation. Undoubtedly these Election Committees—any Election Committee—need a clerk. This proposition is simply to allow a session clerk, and in another portion of this report there is a provision—

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman believe that this committee needs a clerk in view of the statement made by the gentleman form Toron To man from Texas [Mr. RANDELL], that the committee has not organized and has no business before it?

Mr. WEEKS. That statement is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many election cases has your committee before it?

Mr. WEEKS. Three.
Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman think it necessary to have a clerk at $6 a day during the session, in addition to the clerk of the chairman of the committee, in order to dispose of Mr. JOY. The gentleman [Mr. Weeks] has no clerk.
Mr. HEMENWAY. Has he not a regular clerk?
Mr. WEEKS. No, sir.

Mr. JOY. The chairman of Elections Committee No. 3 has not had, since that committee was appointed, even a personal

Mr. HEMENWAY. But he will have under the resolution already passed.

Mr. JOY. No, he will not. That applies only to committees having annual clerks.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How is the gentleman debarred from having a clerk if he is not the chairman of a committee that has an annual clerk?

Mr. JOY. Let me make a statement. Election Committees numbered 2 and 3 are committees that have had session clerks provided for them by resolution heretofore. These provisions all relate back to the date when these clerks were certified to have been employed. The disbursing clerk, however, has refused to pay the personal clerk of the member until this matter is brought up and passed upon. If you should not pass the resolution giving this committee a clerk, I have no doubt that the disbursing officer would pay the salary of a personal clerk of the chairman, upon the proper certificate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is absolutely no doubt about that.

Mr. JOY. But he has no clerk now.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I submit it would be a mistake to allow a clerk at $180 a month during this session, to serve a committee that has only three cases pending before it.

Mr. MADDOX. Here is a member of Elections Committee No.

3 who says that the committee has never organized, or that he has had no notice of it, and knows nothing about it; yet the chairman of the committee says that it is organized. What is the fact in regard to that matter?

Mr. JOY. I do not propose to settle the dispute between those two gentlemen. I know that the committee has had no clerk up to this time, paid for out of any fund; the chairman has not even had a personal clerk.

Mr. MADDOX. Is the committee organized?

Mr. WEEKS. I say it is.

Mr. MADDOX. How is it that you did not notify members of the committee of the organization

A MEMBER. He had no clerk. [Laughter.]
Mr. RANDELL of Texas. My statement that Elections Committee No. 3 is not organized has been challenged. I should like to know when it was organized, by what authority, who gave notice of the organization, and what business is before that committee. I am a member of the committee. The Speaker referred to the committee the election contests from the State of Virginia, and Virginia only. I understand that that one case has been settled by a higher power than any committee of this House; in other words, the contestant has died. Now, if the gentleman claiming to be chairman of the committee has had any session of the committee I should like to know when and where.

Mr. JOY. Let me say that the death of a contestant does not settle any election case. The case referred to may be settled; the death of the contestant does not settle it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. My position is that the committee does not need a clerk in order to settle it.
Mr. JOY. Whether the question is settled or not makes no difference so far as this question is concerned.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. May I ask a question?
Mr. JOY. Certainly.
Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not wish to be understood as opposing the appointment of any clerk for the gentleman's committee, but I wish to inquire what has occurred since I was a member of the Elections Committee which gives a single thing for the clerk of this committee to do. In the Fifty-fourth Congress, where we had a great deal of work, I was a member of Elections Committee No. 1, and therefore I feel able to say that there is not a single thing that a clerk of an Elections Committee can do for the committee. The record is made up by the Clerk of the House; and the work of the committee, being judicial in its character, is something that can not be delegated to a clerk, but must be performed by the members themselves.

Now, I would like to know what has come upon the Committee on Elections in this Congress, or since the time to which I have referred, which calls for the appointment of this clerical assistance?

Mr. JOY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that, not having ever been a member of an Elections Committee, I can not give him definitely the information he seeks. But I think that any committee which has matters before it of general public interest should be supplied with whatever clerical service is necessary. is a matter of economy, and I believe that it will be a saving on the part of the public to treat liberally the committees in the way of affording them clerical assistance.

I know that under the law the Committee on Elections No. 1 which was formerly the Committee on Elections of the House and which, owing to the extent of the business, has been divided into three committees, has always had clerical service provided for it, and that these committees should have that service now. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that there is very much besides the mere consideration of cases and the reporting of them to the House which must be done by these committees.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. You ought to know, as you have been

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. You ought to know, as you have been a victim. [Laughter.]
Mr. JOY. I have been a victim, as my friend suggests, and I know that we ought to deal liberally with these committees, because I know something of the work they have to do. I believe that each committee which has any business before it should be accorded this clerical service, and I hope the resolution will be adorted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, to strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "Elections No. 3."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 88, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]
The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the second paragraph as amended.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Missouri in charge of this resolution, since this provision has been stricken out, ought also to agree to strike out "the Committee on the Pacific Railroads." There is a general belief, I think, that they have not a bill before them, and hence there can be no possible use for a clerk to perform the duties of that committee.

Mr. JOY. I do not agree with the view expressed by the gentleman from California, and I am surprised that our Democratic friends have voted as they have on the former proposition.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?
Mr. JOY. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?
Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; I desire to reply to the gentleman from California on this paragraph relating to the Pacific railroads.

Mr. JOY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Only one minute.
Mr. JOY. I yield that much time to the gentleman.
Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], in his tremendous zeal for economy in the expenditures of this House, has never in any previous Congress in which I have had the honor to serve with him assailed any proposition that had in it the word "Pacific." Now, however, with a desire to cut off the possibility of a clerk to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, he seeks to strike this item out of the resolu-

Mr. Speaker, I regarded it as a compliment to be selected as chairman of that committee, and was told that fifteen years' experience in railroad law had especially fitted me for the duties of that place, so ably presided over by my predecessor, Judge Powers, and felt honored by the Speaker. But, sir, I served as a page to wait upon members when I was a boy. I served as a janitor while I was still young and struggling to earn a living. I served as a clerk while I was a young man. I served in all capacities of life calculated to give a man the rewards of honest toil, and, thank God, I can still serve as a page to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and I can again serve as a janitor in the committee room of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and I can again serve as a clerk to that committee if it is desired. But my district has not commissioned me to do this work, and in the interest of economy, so much observed in small things and so disregarded in large ones, strike this item out!

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, may I move an amendment? The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JOY. I do not think we ought to yield any further on this

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that there is a motion pending to strike out the clerk to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads?

Mr. JOY. There is no such motion.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I make the motion. If the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the committee, desires to have the clerk stricken out, then let him have his desire.

Mr. JOY. I supposed the gentleman from Alabama rose for a parliamentary inquiry only. I do not yield for that motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure that the gentleman from Missouri will not insist on forcing a clerk on that committee against the will of its chairman. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will yield to allow me to make the motion to allow the House to express its wish on that matter.

express its wish on that matter.

Mr. JOY. I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Missouri decline to yield?

Mr. JOY. I do.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the second paragraph.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WOOTEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield for that purpose? Mr. JOY. What is the nature of the gentleman's amendment? Mr. WOOTEN. I wish to renew the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama to strike out the clerk to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

Mr. JOY. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield for that purose. The question is on agreeing to the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Underwood) there were—ayes 89, noes 43.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the paragraph is agreed The Clerk will report the third paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

(3) That the clerk of a committee of the House during the sessions, provided for by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, not disposed of by the resolution adopted by the House December 13, 1901, be, and the same is hereby, allowed and assigned for the present Congress to the Committee on Elections No. 2.

Mr. JOY. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the paragraph.

The paragraph was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) That the chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is hereby authorized to appoint a clerk to said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $2,000 per annum during the present Congress.

Mr. JOY. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The paragraph was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

(5) That the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is hereby authorized to appoint a stenographer to said committee, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House during the Fifty-seventh Congress, at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker— Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words " $$100 \,\mathrm{per}$ month" and insert " $$6 \,\mathrm{per}$ diem."

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, this amendment which I have offered is to pay the stenographer to that committee the same pay that he was given in the last Congress. The stenographer for the Committee on Invalid Pensions must be specially familiar with medical terms. You know that our committee have more than half the bills that are reported in this House. You can not pick up a bootblack or a peanut vender or somebody else who can write a sentimental letter, perhaps, but he must be familiar with the entire medical dictionary, and we can not employ one for any such figures as are proposed in this bill. Not only did you pay him $6 a day during the last Congress, but the Committee on Appropriations reported and the House voted to this man an extra $300, on the ground that he had not been fairly compensated. He works not as we do, for six hours, but comes to the committee room in the morning between 7 and 8 o'clock, stays there until we adjourn, and then comes back about 7 or half past 7 in the evening and is there until 12 and often to 1 or 2 next I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

NN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? morning. I he Mr. MANN.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.
Mr. MANN. Is the stenographer the very efficient one in the committee room?

Mr. SULLOWAY. We have no stenographer in the committee room.

Mr. MANN. Who has been there in the past?
Mr. SULLOWAY. Well, I do not know who we may be able to obtain. Before we had to go to the Pension Bureau. We got a man who was familiar with these things to resign and he had to take his chance of getting his job again, but by accident and Providence and what we could do for him we got him back. [Laughter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a

Mr. SULLOWAY. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does your amendment propose to limit the $6 per diem to the session or for the twelve months?

Mr. SULLOWAY. For the Congress.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I agree heartily with the chairman of the committee in the statement that the gentleman employed as stenographer by the Invalid Pensions Committee works more hours than any other clerk or stenographer employed by any committee in the House or any business establishment in the city. The kind of work that he has to do requires him to be a most careful man. He has daily to translate from the Pension Office all the medical terms, which he is familiar with already; and it is the very highest grade of work that he is called upon to do. Therefore it seems to me that as he serves every member of the House who is serving on that committee, it will be an outrage to him to put him on the pay of these other assistant clerks to committees. I think he ought to have $6 a day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.
The paragraph as amended was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.
The Clerk read paragraph 6, as follows:

(6) That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to employ a messenger who shall serve in the file room of the House, under direction of the file clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $75 per month, until otherwise provided for.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a moment

Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman from California for a minute.

Mr. LOUD. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have increased the salary of this stenographer to $6 a day. The House must remember that this very resolution here gives the chairman of that committee an additional clerk over and above what they have ever had before. I want the House to know that, The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the paragraph.

The paragraph was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. The SPEAKER. To what paragraph? The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

(7) That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to appoint J. J. Constantine as assistant telegraph operator, to serve the minority side of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $100 per month, until otherwise provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. Is it to this paragraph that the gentleman offers an amendment?

Mr. FOSS. I offer the amendment as a separate paragraph.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the paragraph.
Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield

for a question?

Mr. JOY. I will.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will ask if the minority have requested the provision for this gentleman.

Mr. JOY. Quite a good many of the gentlemen of the minority have requested it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You think, then, it is necessary?
Mr. JOY. There are some of the minority, however, that are not in favor of it. I want to be perfectly frank.

The paragraph was agreed to.
Mr. FOSS. I desire to offer an amendment.
The SPEAKER. No amendment can be offered. These are resolutions; but the gentleman can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent to offer this as a separate paragraph

The SPEAKER. This is a disposition of a series of resolutions, considering them by paragraphs; but the gentleman may ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HULL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULL. In the consideration of a bill, when all the sections are read can not an additional section be offered?

The SPEAKER. This is not a bill. This is a series of resolutions, all of which have been open to amendment. Consideration has been concluded, and they have been thoroughly agreed to. The gentleman asks unanimous consent?

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a separate paragraph the following:
"That, in addition to the above, the chairmen of the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs are hereby authorized to appoint assistant clerks to said committees, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, during the sessions of the Fifty-seventh Congress, at the rate of $6 per diem."

Mr. FOSS. Just a word.
Mr. LOUD. Consent has not been given.
The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the paragraph be modified so that the word "Resolved" pre-

Mr. FOSS. · I ask that that modification be made. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. I object.
Mr. MADDOX. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FOSS. Before the gentleman objects, I would like to make an explanation.

MADDOX. I have reserved the right to object. I want to call attention to the fact that it is practically the same thing that was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and voted down.

Mr. LOUD. Just the same thing. Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman listen to me for a moment for an explanation?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.
Mr. FOSS. What has the House done so far as it applies to the Committee on Military Affairs and to the Committee on Naval Affairs up to the present moment? They have substituted in the place of a clerk at $6 a day, which these two committees have had for a number of years, a personal clerk at $100 a month. So long as I have been on the Committee on Naval Affairs we have always had this session clerk at $6 a day, but the House has have always had this session clerk, at $6 a day, but the House has practically cut the amount for clerk service right in two. Now, so far as the Committee on Naval Affairs is concerned, the work upon that committee is double to-day what it was when I first went upon it. I think it is true, in some respects, of the Committee on Military Affairs. I have been paying out of my own pocket for clerical service in the committee room on Naval Affairs. I insist that it is but just and proper that we should have an additional clerk, the same as we have had for years, at $6 per day. There is no reasonable gentleman on the floor of this House that can honestly object to it.

Mr. RAY of New York. The House has done the same thing for the Committee on the Judiciary, cut it down from $6 a day to $100 a month for a personal clerk.

Mr. MADDOX. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that this resolution leaves his committee in a worse condition than it has been heretofore?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; it substitutes for the session clerk, which we have been having at $6 per day, a personal clerk at $100 a month. It practically cuts the amount for clerical service right in two.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I know there are many questions that will come before the Naval Committee at this session of Congress requiring the assistance of clerks, requiring much investigation, that will entail on the committee much labor it never has heretofore had, and I am persuaded that the demand of the chairman of that committee is not only reasonable, but absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of business by the committee. I sincerely hope that gentlemen on this side will not object to what I regard as a reasonable request.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I think it is exactly the same proposition that we voted upon before; but if it is absolutely necessary, as gentlemen say, I shall not object, but leave it to the

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following change of reference was made from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Foreign Affairs: House Document No. 222, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a copy of a communica-tion from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appro-priation for International Bureau of Weights and Measures.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FOSTER for Saturday and Monday next, on account of important

MEMORIAL SERVICES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BROSIUS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Saturday afternoon, February 1, at 3 o'clock, be set apart for memorial addresses on the life, character, and services of the Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS deceased, late a Representative of this House from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that February 1 at 3 o'clock be made a special order for memorial addresses on the life and character of the Hon. MARRIOTT BROSIUS, late a member of this House from Pennsylvania. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BURKE, OF TEXAS.

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. Robert E. Burke, late Representative-elect from the Sixth district of the State of Texas, at his home in the city of Dallas, on June 5, 1901.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate a copy of these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the House do now adjourn out of respect to the memory of the deceased member.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to. Accordingly, in pursuance of the above resolutions and its previous order, the House (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes) adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Saturday, January 18, 1902.

EXECUTION OF LEGAL INSTRUMENTS IN THE PHILIPPINES, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report out of order from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5814) to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico of deeds for land situate in the District of Columbia, to report it favorably, without amendment, and as it is a somewhat urgent measure I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

The Secretary read the fill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That deeds and other instruments affecting land situate in the District of Columbia may be acknowledged in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico before any notary public appointed therein by the civil or military governor thereof commissioned as such by the President of the United States with the like effect as if such deeds had been acknowledged in the District of Columbia before a notary public appointed for said District: Provided, That the certificate by such notary in the Philippine Islands or in Porto Rico, as the case may be, shall be accompanied by the certificate of the governor aforesaid to the effect that the notary taking said acknowledgment was in fact the officer he purported to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the biil?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. That bill or one like it was also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was referred to me as a sub-committee for consideration. It occurred to me at first that the subject belonged to the Committee on the District of Columbia, it being a provision to affect land titles there; but afterwards it occurred to me that the bill ought to be extended to apply to all Territories of the United States. In that point of view it would be proper that the Judiciary Committee should consider it, and I proposed to report it with one or two slight amendments extending it to the other Territories.

I am very glad that the Committee on the District of Columbia have reported the bill. It was clearly within their jurisdiction as it stood. But I should like to offer an amendment to extend it to other territory of the United States.

After the words "District of Columbia," in the fourth line, I move to amend by inserting the words "or any territory of the United States."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In the eighth and ninth lines I move to strike out the words "in the District of Columbia" and insert the words "in the jurisdiction where the land lies;" so that it will read:

With the like effect as if such deed had been acknowledged in the juris-ction where the land lies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. At the end of the ninth line I move to strike out the words "for said District" and insert the word "therein."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the execution in the Philippine Islands and in Porto Rico of deeds for land situate in the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States.'

PRISONERS OF WAR IN BERMUDA.

Mr. HOAR. I move to reconsider an order passed yesterday, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate certain information in regard to the exaction of duties the Senate certain information in regard to the exaction of duties by the authorities in Bermuda on articles sent to the Boer prisoners of war there. It was stated that the article of the Hague convention, of which that is in contradiction, was adopted. It is in what is known as the second convention, which has been adopted by Great Britain, but which has not as yet been acted upon by the Senate. Further, I am informed that the governor of Bermuda has stated unofficially to persons interested—the information came to me yesterday—that he proposes to recommend to the legislature of Bermuda to repeal so much of the law as exacts those duties. Under those circumstances, I ask that the resolution be reconsidered and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Foreign Relations.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Massa-chusetts if any facts were submitted with the resolution which have been printed.

Mr. HOAR. No facts were submitted. I received from a gentleman of the very highest distinction and authority in this country a statement that these duties were exacted on articles intended for prisoners of war in Bermuda, where, as the Senator knows very well, there is a large aggregation of Boer prisoners. The convention at The Hague provided that all such articles sent to prisoners of war should be transported free over government railroads; but that turns out to be in the second or supplementary convention adopted at The Hague, which has been agreed to by Great Britain, but which the Senate has not yet acted upon So there is no violation of a treaty obligation. Still, under the circumstances, it is a matter which I think would be proper to inquire into as a question of the behavior of a civilized nation on such a subject but for the further fact, of which I was informed yesterday afternoon, that the governor of that territory proposes to submit promptly to the legislature a proposition for the repeal of the law requiring the exaction of duties in such cases. So I desire to have the resolution asking the President for information reconsidered and to submit it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, if I may be indulged for a moment, I merely wanted the information which I have from the Senator, because I am very thoroughly in sympathy with him in this matter, and I desired to have any information that he was willing to submit to the Senate printed. I am very glad he has willing to submit to the Senate printed. I am very glad he has made it a subject of inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care about quoting publicly the name of my informant, but I will give it to the Senator or to the committee in private, with great pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution submitted by him yesterday touching the inquiry as to the Bermuda Islands was adopted. Islands was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I moved just now, and the Senate adopted the motion, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to calling on the President for certain information. I am informed by the Secretary that that resolution has been sent to the President. So the proper motion should be that the resolution be recalled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Without objection, it will be reconsidered.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to return to the Senate the resolution of the Senate, transmitted to him January 15, in regard to "whether the British Government exact duties on goods intended for prisoners of war in Bermuda," etc.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the issue of the New York Herald of the 14th of this month, which, in its Washington correspondence of Monday last, sets forth what purports to be a poll of the Senate as to the attitude of Senators on the question of preferring the Nicaragua or the Panama route for a canal across the Central American Isthmus. Panama route for a canal across the Central American Isthmus. The correspondent professes to have interviewed the Senators whose opinions on that subject are here given and gives the language of several Senators. Among the number whose opinion is set forth in the column in which those who are willing to consider the Panama proposition are placed is my name.

I take this occasion, Mr. President, to say that I had no interview to such effect with anyone on that subject; that the statement as to my attitude is false and is entirely contrary to the ment as to my attitude is false and is entirely contrary to the views which I do entertain. I will take this occasion also to say, Mr. President, that I am at present, with all the light that I have on the subject, decidedly in favor of pushing the Nicaragua project as rapidly as possible; and if it were in my power to bring that project before the Senate to-day and to vote on it after due deliberation, I should be very glad to do so.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, this same article states that a clear majority of the Senate will oppose action on the Nicaragua bill until the rival route has been discussed. It gives then a list of the Senators in favor of the Nicaragua route and a list of those in favor of the Panama proposition, and states that I favor the Panama proposition.

I am not accustomed, Mr. President, to stating to newspaper correspondents how I stand or how I shall vote on any great proposition. I never in my life have intimated to anyone that I was in favor of the Panama route, and, so far as my name is concerned, this statement is without authority.

I desire to state now that, with the lights I have before me and the investigation which I have made, unless the facts shall cause me to change my opinion, I shall vote in favor of the Nicaragua route.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now closed and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CLAY subsequently said: Mr. President, I do not desire to do anyone an injustice. I stated this morning that in an article in the New York Herald my name appeared among a list of Senators in favor of the Panama route. On reading the article I find that the headlines would make it so appear, but in the body of the article I observe that both the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] and myself are simply placed among a list of Senators who are in favor of a thorough investigation of all the routes and the selection of that route which is the most practicable and to the best interests of the United States. Consequently, I find that the body of the article and the headlines do not correspond, and I make this statement in justice to the correspondent.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 569, to establish the department of com-

The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the considerasks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 569) to establish the department of commerce, Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, under Rule VIII.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered without reference to Rule VIII, so as not to limit debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be had without the limitation of debate contributed in Rule VIII.

be had without the limitation of debate contained in Rule VIII.

Mr. NELSON. And without any other limitation of the rule. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I now ask that the bill be read for amendment,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one committee amendment, and that has not yet been stated.

Mr. NELSON. The Senate has not yet acted on any amendment. There is one committee amendment. There is one committee amendment, and after that is acted upon there will probably be two or three other amendments of senate.

offered. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Commerce reported an amendment to the bill, to insert as a new section the following:

Sec. 10. That all power and authority heretofore possessed or exercised by the head of any Executive Department over any bureau, office, branch, or division of the public service, by this act transferred to the department of commerce, or any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, whether of an appellate or revisory character, or otherwise, shall hereafter be vested in and exercised by the head of the said department of commerce. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are, so far as so inconsistent, hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. In line 8 on page 2, section 2, after the words "chief clerk," I move to insert the words "and a disbursing clerk;" so as to read:

There shall also be one chief clerk and a disbursing clerk and such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I now offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 10 of the same section. The object of this amendment is to have the Auditor of the State and other Departments audit the accounts of the new department as he does those of the other departments. This is in the language of the law in respect to the other departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2, on page 2, line 10, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert:

And the Auditor for the State and other Departments shall receive all accounts accruing in or relative to the department of commerce and examine the same, and thereafter certify the balance and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his decision thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. On page 3, section 4, line 7, after the words "and that," I move to strike out the words "the office of Commissioner of Railroads."

I desire to explain that amendment to the Senate, bill was originally prepared at the last Congress the office of Commissioner of Railroads was an existing office. It had escaped my attention that in an appropriation bill at the last Congress provision was made for abolishing the office, and the office of Commissioner of Railroads was abolished, to take effect on the 30th of June last. So there is no longer such an office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by

The Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 3, section 4, line 7, after the words "and that," it is proposed to strike out "the office of Commissioner of Railroads."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment, which I shall explain, as well as one or two subsequent minor amendments, which I am going to offer in a moment. On page 4, section 4, line 6, I move to strike out the first word, "relating," and insert pertaining exclusively."

Under the clause, as now broadly drawn, all the archives of the Consular Bureau in the State Department, covering a great deal of diplomatic correspondence, would be transferred to this new department. I know that such is not the intention of the bill, and I therefore suggest the change, striking out the word "relating," and inserting the words "pertaining exclusively," so as to confine the transference of the archives from the Consular Bureau to those which relate to commerce and statistics.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 4, section 4, at the beginning of line 6, it is proposed to strike out the word "relating," and to insert the words "pertaining exclusively," so as to read:

That the official records and papers now on file in and pertaining exclusively to the business of any bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service in this act transferred to the department of commerce; together with the furniture now in use in such bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service, shall be, and hereby is, transferred to the department of commerce.

Mr. NELSON. I can see no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest in line 10, in the same clause, after the word "hereby," to strike out the word "is" and to insert the word "are;" so as to read: "and hereby are, transferred to the department of commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On page 5, I desire to offer two or three small amendments, all of which have a common purpose, and that purpose is to leave it within the control of the State Department to separate in the consular correspondence those portions which are diplomatic and political from those which are commercial, so that the commercial part may all be transferred to the department of commerce, but that anything diplomatic or political shall be retained in the State Department. That work, of course, must be done in that Department, in my opinion.

I shall offer a further amendment at the end of the bill, provid-

I shall offer a further amendment at the end of the bill, providing for an officer in the State Department to take charge of that specific work, which, of course, has hitherto been performed by the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, which it is now proposed to transfer to the new department.

In line 6, section 5, page 5, after the words "Secretary of," I move to strike out "commerce" and insert "State;" so that the consuls, etc., shall act under the direction of the Secretary of State. It seems to me it is improper for them to have two masters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, section 5, line 6, after the words "Secretary of," it is proposed to strike out "commerce" and insert "State;" so as to read:

And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile, from time to time, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, industries, and markets of the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited.

Mr. NELSON. There is no objection to the amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. In the same section, on page 5, line 7, after the word "time," I move to insert "upon the request of the secretary of commerce;" so as to read:

To gather and compile, from time to time, upon the request of the secretary of commerce, useful and material information, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. In the same section, on page 5, line 10, after the words "to send," I move to insert "under the direction of the Secretary of State;" so as to read:

To send, under the direction of the Secretary of State, reports quarterly, or oftener if required, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I now offer as a new section, to come in at the end of the bill, an amendment providing for the appointment of an officer in the State Department, whom I have already described, to go over these reports and separate the portions which are to go to the department of commerce.

The PRESIDENT protempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

Sec. 11. A person to be designated by the Secretary of State shall be appointed to formulate for the instruction of consular officers the requests of the secretary of commerce, and to prepare from the dispatches of consular officers, for transmission to the secretary of commerce, such information as pertains to the work of the department of commerce, and such person shall have the rank and salary of a chief of bureau and be furnished with such clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether the powers therein conferred upon this new officer in any manner differ from the powers now enjoyed by the officer whom it is sought to replace?

Mr. LODGE. The whole Bureau of Foreign Commerce in the State Department, which has now charge of the consular reports, is by this bill transferred to the department of commerce.

Mr. BACON. I so understand.

Mr. LODGE. And the Secretary of State, as I understand, needs somebody to do the work which the bill imposes on his Department; that is, to go over all these consular reports, separate the commercial part and send it to the new department, and also to transmit to the consuls their instructions, the object being to retain the work of editing the consular reports in the State Department, which I think is very essential, because that is the diplometric and redifficent Department.

partment, which I think is very essential, because that is the diplomatic and political Department.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator, and I quite understood from what he had previously stated what he now says; but that does not reply to the inquiry which I made, which was whether the numerous powers and duties in the amendment offered by the Senator, which are to be enjoyed by the new officer created by the amendment, in any manner differ from the powers and privileges now enjoyed by the officer who is to be transferred to the department of commerce. What I desire to know is. to the department of commerce. What I desire to know is, whether this amendment clothes the new officer of the department of commerce with the same powers which the officer now in of commerce with the same powers which the officer now in charge of that bureau in the State Department has.

Mr. LODGE. That, I understand, is the purpose and object of the amendment. Of course, the work now is all done in the State Department, and, as I understand it, the head of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, under the direction of one of the Assistant Secroreign Commerce, under the direction of one of the Assistant Secretaries, edits these reports for publication. The commercial portions are all published by the Department. Those portions which it is considered inadvisable to publish are held in manuscript in the Department. The officer who does that, if I am correctly informed, is to be transferred to the department of commerce, where he will be simply a compiler of statistics, and the duties in the way of editing and separating the political and diplomatic information require a new officer for their performance in the State Department. Department.

Mr. BACON. I certainly am extremely unfortunate that I can not express myself in such a manner that the Senator will catch the purport of my inquiry. It is my fault, I suppose.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. It is my slowness of apprehension, I have no doubt.

Mr. BACON. Taking all the fault to myself, I will repeat the inquiry. It is not as to the necessity for this new officer. I did not ask that. I recognize that from what the Senator has stated. But the amendment offered by the Senator confers certain powers on and enumerates certain duties of the new officer. The inquiry I make of the Senator is this: Are those duties and those powers the same as the duties and the powers of the chief of this bureau which is to be transferred to the new department, or does this amendment confer upon the new officer other duties and other powers, which the present officer does not enjoy?

Mr. LODGE. I understand that all those powers are now existent in the officer of the State Department.

Mr. BACON. One other question, Mr. President. Though I think that ought to be carefully looked into, I think the Senator ought to be able to state definitely whether it is so—
Mr. LODGE. If the Senator wants me to put the language more strongly, I will say I know that to be the case.
Mr. BACON. That is entirely satisfactory.
Mr. LODGE. Except, of course, it is modified, as the Senator understands, by the fact that these statistics are to go to the new department instead of being published by the old one.

department instead of being published by the old one.

Mr. BACON. I understand, but one other inquiry. we have not the amendment before us, and can only catch it from the reading at the desk. Does this amendment confer any rank upon the new officer other than that enjoyed by the present officer?

Mr. LODGE.

Mr. BACON. What is the position of the present officer?
Mr. LODGE. The present officer is the chief of a bureau, who, of course, acts under the direction of one of the Assistant Secretaries of State.

Mr. BACON. As this one will also? Mr. LODGE. As this one will also.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the amendment again

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The Secretary. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 11. A person to be designated by the Secretary of State shall be appointed to formulate for the instruction of consular officers the requests of the secretary of commerce and to prepare from the dispatches of consular officers, for transmission to the secretary of commerce, such information as pertains to the work of the department of commerce, and such person shall have the rank and salary of a chief of bureau, and be furnished with such clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, somewhere in the bill that I saw as originally reported was a provision that our consuls at foreign as originally reported was a provision that our consuls at foreign ports should report to the secretary of this new department.

Mr. SPOONER. That is on page 5.

Mr. HALE. That seemed to me to be faulty. Now, if the object of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] is to cure that defect, he has in view precisely what I had, as to which I had proposed to offer an amendment—that instead of the consular officers, who are officers of the State Department and appointed by the State Department, as they ought to be, and reporting to the State Department, as it seems to me they ought to do, the provision originally, as I understood it, was that they should have a divided allegiance and report directly to another department, which seemed to me not a good thing to do. As I understand this amendment, instead of that the Senator proposes that this information shall be gathered by the consuls as now and reported to the State Department as now, and that the Secretary of State shall then, in some way that is prescribed, communicate this shall then, in some way that is prescribed, communicate this information, these facts, and these statistics for the information of the new secretary. Is that the purpose?

Mr. LODGE. That is my purpose. I think perhaps the Senator from Maine was not here when certain amendments of mine on page 5 were adopted, to which this amendment is supplementary. mentary

Mr. HALE. No, I was not here. What is that amendment on

Mr. LODGE, On page 5 the bill has been so amended as to read:

And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State—

Mr. HALE. That is the provision to which I allude.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate has stricken out the word "commerce" and inserted the word "State," so as to read: "Secretary of State." I am reading the provision as it has been amended. State." I am reading the provision as it has been amended.
Mr. HALE. That is proper.
Mr. LODGE. The clause continues—to gather and compile, from time to time, upon the request of the secretary of commerce, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, industries, and markets of the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited, and to send, under direction of the Secretary of State, reports quarterly, or oftener if required, of the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, to the secretary of the department of commerce.

So that it relieves them from two masters.

Mr. HALE. And does not in any way impair or undermine either the duties or dignities of the office of Secretary of State?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. HALE. I think that ought not to be done.

Mr. LODGE. It leaves him entirely in control of the consular service, as he ought to be, and authorizes the secretary of the new department of commerce to say: "I want such and such information," and then the Department of State transmits it to the department of commerce. This is to permit an officer to do the work of editing and separating the consular reports.

Mr. HALE. I think, then, the bill has been very greatly improved. The State Department has permit and the state of the state of

Mr. HALE. I think, then, the bill has been very greatly improved. The State Department has not much real business to do, except in relation to the consular service. The diplomatic part—the part that is performed by ambassadors, ministers, and ministers resident-is more a matter of negotiation, which is ordinarily done outside of these offices; but the time when the State Department touches real business, the transaction of business of commerce in relation to which our citizens abroad have any interest, all comes under the consular service, and it is about all, as I have said, of real business that there is in the State Department. I should not, for one, be willing to consent that the duties of the Secretary of State or his responsibilities or his dignity should be impaired, and I was proposing to offer a similar amendment be impaired, and I was proposing to offer a similar amendment, which the Senator has done in much better form than I could have done it. To that extent I think it improves the bill.

Of course, Mr. President, the bill is what I would call a very great enterprise very suddenly launched upon us. That makes a larger department than any one left in the Government. If I may be permitted to say it, it does not begin in a modest way, but it ransacks all the departments, selects bureau after bureau without apparent reason, dumps them into this bill, and makes a new department and a new secretary, with larger duties than any other Cabinet minister.

other Cabinet minister.

The administrative duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, after his Department has been stripped and ransacked, will not be as great as those of this new secretary. He takes charge of these great bureaus that have from the time of the establishment of the Government been in the Treasury Department and, so far as I know, satisfactorily administered.

The bill is called "A bill to establish the department of commerce," and the subjects-matter that are in it have not so much relation to commerce as light has to darkness. Why should the Census Bureau-a pure matter of internal consequence, internal business, in a great department dealing with the internal affairs of the country, the population of the country—why should that be put into the department of commerce? Before the bill is concluded—I am waiting now for the figures and statistics—I hope to be able to show that if the Coast and Geodetic Survey, dealing with science, not with commerce, is to be taken from the Treasury, it should not be put into this department, but into the Navy Department

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt

Certainly. Mr. NELSON. We have been perfecting the bill by amendments, and I was coming to that feature of the bill, and was going to submit the question as to the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Senate. I understand—if I am not taking up the time of the Senator-

Mr. HALE. I yield with great pleasure. Mr. NELSON. I understand there has b I understand there has been some controversy between the Treasury Department and the Department of the Navy as to that matter. In view of that fact, it is my impression that we had better leave it out of this bill and leave the question to be settled subsequently as to whether it should remain in the Treasury or go to the Navy Department. To be candid and to express my own individual opinion, in view of the work which that Bureau or branch of the service performs, I think its duties would be more appropriate and more germane to the Department of the Navy; and if the Senator will allow me and has no objection I will move to strike that out of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection, but we are eliminating so much here that we had better make one mouthful of it and transfer that Bureau to the Navy Department. The truth is—I will not fer that Bureau to the Navy Department. The truth is—I will not interrupt the Senator, of course—

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is entitled to the floor, not I.

Mr. HALE. The truth is, that we are getting to have half a dozen different navies, Mr. President, and we ought not to. We have got a navy in the Life-Saving Service; we have got a navy in the Light-House Board; we have got a navy in the Revenue-Cutter Service; we have got a navy in the Cast and Geodetic Survey, and I suspect it will not be long before my enterprising and stirring friend, who is at the head of the Geological Survey, will want a navy. We is at the head of the Geological Survey, will want a navy. ought to have but one.

ought to have but one.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. MONEY. Has not the Treasury Department a navy in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. HALE. I think I mentioned that.

Mr. MONEY. I beg pardon. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.
Mr. TILLMAN. I simply want to refer to one other navy, and that is the Army transport service, which is assuming magnificent proportions, and about which I have heard some little scan-

Mr. LODGE. That is being steadily abolished and reduced, I will say for the information of the Senator from South Carolina.

will say for the information of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HALE. All these suggestions are precisely in the line of what I am trying to bring forward before the Senate. Here is an attempt—and in itself, if kept in proper limits, a wise attempt—to bring different branches that are in some degree cognate in their duties under one head; but while we are about it we ought not to divide and put the various duties of these bureaus into a new department where they naturally do not belong, and take them from another where they do belong.

The Navy Department at one time practically administered the duties of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, furnishing accomplished officers who led their parties and who conducted to a considerable degree their surveys and triangulations. It was then as efficient a service as it has ever been since, and a Senator on my right says a great deal more so. I am inclined to thing he is correct about

I want to get my figures—I do not expect, of course, that the bill will pass to-day, because there is a great deal in it that we want to discuss—but after I get my figures, I think I shall move an amendment to transfer the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Navy Department. The Senator in charge of the bill, who is, I think, reasonable in his conduct of it in every way, sees the force of the objection that that Survey should not be in this bill and is inclined to let it go out; but while we are launching upon the work of reassorting and rearranging bureaus we might as well do the whole business here. When the proper time comes I think I shall make the motion which I have indicated. I will not make it at present.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Maine permit me a moment?

Mr. HALE. Yes.
Mr. MONEY. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] that he have his amendment printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as it touches the State Department somewhat. I think that would be the proper course if it meet his approval. I do not want to make the motion herecome

Mr. LODGE. The amendment now pending simply creates an officer at the head of a new bureau. It does not require to be entirely germane and it does not require any action by another

Mr. MONEY. I have no desire to make a motion. I merely made the suggestion. I should like to see it in print.

Mr. LODGE. It will be printed to-morrow. I think when the Senator looks at it he will see that it is a very small matter. It is the creation of only one office.

Mr. MONEY. As I understood, the Senator proposed the immediate consideration and adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I simply moved the amendment. It is now

Mr. MONEY. It is now pending. It may be very largely concluded-

Mr. LODGE. There is no objection to it on the part of the committee having the bill in charge.

Mr. MONEY. That may be, but there may be objection outside of the committee, and I should be glad to see it in print. If there is no intention of concluding the bill to-day, and I guess we will hardly do that, I should be very glad if no vote shall be taken until it can be examined into a little.

Mr. HALE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is a good one. I am free to say Mr. LODGE. Let it go over and be printed. I will not move it now.

Mr. MONEY. I think that is right.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has it about right, that we will probably adopt it, but I think it wise not unduly to seek dispatch in a matter of this great importance. There is time enough in the Senate to consider it. Other matters are not pressing, and while I shall not stand in the way of the passage of the bill in any undue fashion, yet I want to get some figures as to the Coast and Geodetic Survey

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is now withdrawn, and he asks that it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HALE. That it be printed.
Mr. LODGE. That is my request.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to move to strike out section 6. I understand the committee having the matter in charge have agreed that it shall go out.

Mr. LODGE. Idid not hear the Senator from Colorado. What section does he propose to strike out?

Mr. TELLER. To strike out section 6, which proposes to transfer the Geological Survey from the Interior Department to the new department. I understand the committee agree that it may be done.

Mr. NELSON. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado to strike out the whole of section 6.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the direction given his amendment includes all the amendments offered by him?

Oh, no; the others were adopted. It simply covers the last one? The last one. Mr. LODGE. Mr. BACON.

Mr. LODGE.

Mr. BACON. Which is complete in itself?

Mr. LODGE. Which is complete in itself, being a new section.

Mr. BACON. Very well.
Mr. HALE. Has section 6 gone out bodily?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has gone out.
Mr. HALE. The entire section?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entire section.

Mr. HALE. That is right. The confusion was such that I could not understand.

Mr. HALE. There are—
Mr. NELSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator in charge of the bill wishes to offer an amendment, I will yield.

Mr. NELSON. I offer a further amendment. On page 3, lines 3 and 4, I move to strike out the words "and the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.'

Mr. HALE. I move to insert after the words proposed to be stricken out the words, "and the same is hereby transferred to the Navy Department."

Now, Mr. President, I do not expect—
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Maine does not work to the property of the development.

want a vote on his amendment to-day?

want a vote on his amendment to-day?

Mr. HALE. No. The Senator from Connecticut says he hopes
I will not ask for a vote on the amendment to-day. I do not expect that the Senate will vote on it to-day. I want them to have a little time to consider. It is proper, I think, that it should go there, but I would not precipitate a vote on my amendment now.
Then I want also, as other Senators do, to discuss the Census Bureau and several other subjects. Therefore I shall not insist upon a vote to-day and upless there are other amendments. upon a vote to-day, and unless there are other amendments

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Maine permit me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I hope there will be no attempt to secure to-day a vote either upon the bill or any of the important amendments which have been suggested. I desire to say that as I look at it to-day I do not see any reason why one of the most valuable bureaus in the United States Government should be forcibly removed from the present Department to which it is attached and transferred to this new department. I refer to the office of the Commissioner of Patents, which has had pretty hard and severe treatment hitherto, Mr. President.

The Patent Office building was built for that office, and at some subsequent time it was attached to the Interior Department. The Interior Department proceeded to utilize, occupy, and crowd the Patent Office until the disposition of the people of the United States and its Congress, in providing that building for the Patent Office and the recognition of the Patent Office in thus providing Thus forcibly, and without any reason that I can think of, to take the Patent Office away from the Interior Department, with which it has become correlated and adjusted, so that its business proceeds by rules and regulations, it seems to me would be a very strange proceeding. I do not want to go into it to-day. I can say considerable on this subject, and before the bill comes to a conclusion I should like to be heard on that proposition.

Mr. HALE. I think there is a general feeling that these great subject-matters ought to be investigated, and we can not do it today. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the considera-

INTERSTATE AND WEST INDIAN EXPOSITION.

R. 15) to encourage the holding of the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition in the city of Charleston, county of Charleston, State of South Carolina, during the years 1901 and 1902.

The first amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

Clause and insert:

That to reimburse the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition Company, at Charleston, S. C., for expenses heretofore incurred or that may be incurred up to June 1, 1902, on account of the United States Government exhibit at said exposition, for transportation, sleeping-car fares, subsistence of Government employees, freight, installation and care, construction of building occupied by the Fish Commission exhibit, and for compensation for floor space occupied by the Government exhibits other than that of the Fish Commission in the exposition building, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed on vouchers presented by said exposition company and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary. In line 6 it is proposed to strike out the words "June 1, 1902," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the time of closing said exposition and incident thereto."

Mr. TILLMAN. I will explain that the House has substituted for the joint resolution an amendment which provides an appropriation of $15,000 more than the Senate gave. We passed the priation of $15,000 more than the Senate gave. We passed the joint resolution some little time ago before the holidays, approjoint resolution some little time ago before the holidays, appropriating $75,000. The House proposes to appropriate $90,000, and the amendment goes on specifically to provide to what expenditures that money shall apply. But the officials of the Treasury Department have called our attention at this end to the fact that the limitation of time, June 1, 1902, would leave no opportunity for exhibitors to pack the exhibit and return it here or pay the freight on it. My amendment merely provides that the House amendment shall be so amended as to end the whole business and have no deficits coming in later or any hitch as to how the $90,000. have no deficits coming in later or any hitch as to how the $90,000 shall be expended.

MESSENGERS IN DOORKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts:

The Clerk read as follows:

Report to accompany House resolution No. 95.

Report to accompany House resolution No. 95.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolutions Nos. 83 and 85, have had the same under careful consideration, and beg leave to report a resolution in lieu thereof, and to recommend its adoption.

These resolutions provide for two messengers in the Doorkeeper's department, at salaries at the rate of $1.200 and $1.000 per annum, respectively, and are said to be necessary in the press gallery and at one of the entrances to the Hall of the House, by reason of the operation of the law which removed from those places the persons who were transferred from the folding room to perform that service in the past.

House resolution No. 95.

Received That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to an

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby authorized to appoint two additional messengers, one at the rate of $1,200 per annum and one at the rate of $1,000 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, during the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if this has been reported by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. JOY. It was reported by the Committee on Accounts last

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it a unanimous report?
Mr. JOY. It is a unanimous report, as I remember it.
Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me for a moment—
Mr. JOY. I will yield.
Mr. BARTLETT. With reference to these resolutions, Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the resolution was passed, as far as I am concerned, when I was not in the committee. Probably it was my own fault, but I did not know that the committee meeting was to be held that morning. It appears that notices were sent out late in the evening, and I did not receive mine in time to be here the next morning. These resolutions were considered in a committee meeting at which I was present, and both were defeated overwhelmingly. On the next day this committee meeting was held and they were passed. As I say, I was not present at that meeting and did not know that it was to be held at the time. I do not know the reason why they were presented at the subsequent meeting, nor do I know the reason why they were reported favorably after they had been passed upon adversely. Now, I have given the gentleman from Tennessee all the information in my possession.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think the gentleman states it quite fairly.

This matter came up, but was not considered. It was laid aside.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not desire to state what occurred in committee, but the records will show that the resolutions were voted down. If I am not correct, the chairman of the committee will correct me.

Mr. JOY. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in that

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know, of my own knowledge, and can not give any information to the House as to the reasons why this additional force should be given as proposed by the pending resolution. At the time the matter was considered in the committee, when I was present, there seemed to be no reason whatever for a favorable report, and as a consequence the resolution was voted adversely almost unanimously.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentle-

mr. Hemen way. Mr. speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question, with his consent.

Mr. JOY. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEMEN WAY. I wish to ask the gentleman if the messenger proposed for the press gallery is to take the place of the folder who was transferred there during the last Congress?

Mr. JOY. That is true with reference to both of these employees; and further, Mr. Speaker, in this connection I may be permitted to state that there are on the rolls less by 20 messengers than the number employed in the preceding Congress on account than the number employed in the preceding Congress on account of the details from the folding room.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And this messenger is necessary in order that the press gallery may be properly cared for and that the members of the Press can get access to and information from the members of the House?

Mr. HOY. That is correct, and the Declaration of the little of the little and the pressure of the little of the little litt

Mr. JOY. That is correct; and the Doorkeeper thinks that with this addition no other requests will be made for an increase of the force

Mr. HEMENWAY. The committee thinks, on investigation of the matter, that this is all the force that will be required?

Mr. JOY. That is the opinion of the committee, and the Door-keeper says that no further requests of a similar character will

Mr. HEMENWAY. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, I have no desire to oppose the resolution, but hope the Doorkeeper will stand by his statement and not seek any additional increase of this force.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri.

souri yield to me for a few moments in connection with this res-

Mr. JOY. How much time does the gentleman from Georgia desire?

Mr. BARTLETT. Only two or three minutes.
Mr. JOY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia such time as he may desire.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I believe the chairman of Committee on Accounts has stated that my former statement, which was not questioned but rather gainsayed by the gentlemen from California [Mr. Loud], was correct.

I have not yet, owing to my inability to hear the colloquy between the gentleman from Missouri and the getleman from Indiana [Mr. Hemenway], been able to learn what were the reasons at the time that this resolution was considered in the committee or what are the reasons at the present time why this resolution should be adopted by the House. The only information I had or have with reference to the new employees is that at the cummittee meeting when I was present it was stated that they were not necessary, and the committee, I believe, voted them down.

Now, while I am disposed to be exceedingly liberal in reference to furnishing the House and the members of the House and its officers with all of the help in the way of employees that are necessary, I can not vote for this resolution, nor do I think the members of the House ought to support it, unless the chairman of the committee, or some member of the committee, or some body on the floor of the House can furnish reasons other than those which I have been able to hear why these additional employees should be put upon the roll of the House.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Georgia, I will state that this matter was considered carefully by the Committee on Accounts, and after hearing from the Doorkeeper as to the necessity for the employment of these persons the committee voted for the adoption of the resolution. The gentleman is aware, of course, of the fact that in the preceding Congress provision was made for the detail of a good many employees in the fall in the processor of the committee down. the folding room to act as messengers at the committee doors and for other purposes. In the latter part of the last Congress a resolution passed the House providing that no more such details should be made. Up to the present time the number of these employees for the different committees which were provided for by the former resolution amounts to 20 in number less than those employed in the last Congress. After the fullest hearing it seemed to me and to the committee that these two additional employees were needed, and, I repeat, I am informed by the Doorkeeper that this is the last request of this character which will be made in this Congress.

I might state further to the gentleman from Georgia that I did not speak of this when the matter was considered in the committee at the time to which he refers, because I was not then familiar with the facts, which I have since learned from the Doorkeeper. I think the two messengers are needed, and for that reason I ask the House to adopt the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The resolution was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report to the House the bill which I send to

The bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read the first and second times, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to give notice that on Monday next I will ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill. Mr. CLARK. I should like to know how much money this bill carries Mr. CANNON. Sixteen millions and over.

Mr. CLARK. Is this the only deficiency bill for this year?
Mr. CANNON. No; I apprehend that near the close of the session an additional deficiency bill will be necessary; but I am of the opinion that this is the largest deficiency bill.

Mr. CLARK. How much does it amount to altogether? Mr. CANNON. This bill carries something over $16,000,000.

CAR TRANSFER OVER THE DULUTH CANAL.

Mr. MORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 2008) to authorize the city of Duluth, Minn., to construct and maintain, or cause to be constructed and maintained. a car transfer over the Duluth Canal, and for that purpose to occupy certain lands of the United States, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Duluth, Minn., is hereby authorized to construct and maintain, or cause to be constructed and maintained, a suspended car transfer, or aerial ferry, over the Duluth Canal on the line of Lake avenue, in said city, and for that purpose to locate the towers and approaches of said structure on the lands of the United States pertaining to said canal, as indicated and set forth on plans and drawings attached to a certain revocable license issued by the Secretary of War to the city of Duluth under date of September 6, 1901, now on file in the War Department: Provided, That in the maintenance of the said structure, and in the use and occupancy of the lands of the United States, the said city of Duluth shall conform to the conditions prescribed and enumerated in the aforesaid revocable license: Provided further, That the city of Duluth shall make any changes in the said structure and any changes in the towers and approaches located on the said lands of the United States which the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was read, as follows:

After the word "license" in line 4, page 2, insert the words, "and to the following additional conditions: (1) That the bridge shall have a clear height of at least 135 feet above ordinary high water. (2) That the transfer car shall have a clear height of at least 6 feet above the promenade of the United States concrete piers. (3) That the erection of the bridge shall be carried on in such a manner as to cause the least obstruction to navigation, and the location of the false works, the extent to which they shall occupy the canal, the period of such occupancy, and other details of like character, shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. (4) That the United States lands, retaining walls, and other details of the approaches must be of a character approved by the United States engineer officer in charge of the district, and the motive power for propelling the transfer car must be satisfactory to him."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say that as the reading of the bill could not be perfectly understood, I would like some explanation of it. From what committee has the bill been reported?

Mr. MORRIS. From the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is the report unanimous?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Minnesota kindly tell us what Government property it is proposed to occupy, and will he generally give us an explanation of the measure

Mr. MORRIS. The Government property sought to be occupied by this structure is a small portion of the parkway which has been reserved on the outside of each of the concrete piers rehas been reserved on the outside of each of the concrete piers recently constructed on both sides of the Duluth Ship Canal. A temporary permit has already been granted by the Secretary of War for the erection of this structure, and this bill is only intended to give the sanction of Congress to that temporary permit and make it permanent, subject, however, to future action by Congress. This structure will be made so high that it will be absolutely no obstruction to navigation. Ships carrying the highest masts of any vessels coming into that port will be able to sail right under this structure. The transfer is to be made by a sort of carriage or car, which will be swung across the canal. There is but one similar structure in the world. This is an attempt on the part of the city of Duluth to get around the difficulty of crossing the ship canal. That is all there is about the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman to say that the Secretary of War has favorably acted upon this matter?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes; after a most careful investigation by the local engineer. This bill was referred to the War Depart-ment, and by that Department referred to the local engineer, by whom the amendment just read has been suggested, in order to whom the amendment just read has been suggested, in order to guard as strictly as possible all rights of the Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How is this public land now used?

Mr. MORRIS. Simply as a parkway on the outside of each of the piers which have been constructed on the two sides of the ship canal. This ship canal is at the entrance of the harbor, and smp canal. This smp canal is at the entrance of the harbor, and two concrete piers have been constructed there, each perhaps a quarter of a mile long. On each side of these piers there is a small parkway which has been reserved. The approaches to this bridge will cross that parkway, and the high towers on either end will rest upon the parkway. That is the whole object of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It does not interfere with the public use of the land, then?

Mr. MORRIS. Not in the slightest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CITIES AND TOWNS IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 53) for the protection of cities and towns in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any incorporated city or town in the Indian Territory having a population of 1,000 or more is hereby authorized to issue bonds and borrow money thereon, to be used for the construction of sewers and waterworks and the building of schoolhouses; such bonds not to exceed an amount the interest on which at 5 per cent per annum would be liquidated by a tax of 5 mills upon the dollar of the valuation of the taxable property in such city or town, to be ascertained by the last assessment for purposes of taxation: Provided, That before such bonds shall be issued the same shall be authorized by a two-thirds majority vote of the qualified voters of such city or town voting at an election held for that purpose, notice of which shall be published for four consecutive weeks prior thereto in a newspaper of general circulation published in such municipality: And provided further, That such bonds shall not be issued until it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the judge of the United States court for the judicial district in which such municipality is located, by petition of the mayor and council thereof, or otherwise, that all the requirements of this section shall have been compiled with, who shall thereupon cause to be entered upon the minutes of his court a judgment or decree reciting the facts as he finds them to be.

SEC. 2. That such bonds shall contain all necessary provisions as to the forms, with conditions expressing the contract, shall be signed by the mayor and countersigned by the treasurer of such municipality, who shall keep a proper record of such bonds. Said bonds shall not bear a rate of interest exceeding 5 per cent, payable semiannually, and none of them shall be sold at less than their par value.

SEC. 3. That any municipality incurring any indebtedness for the purposes provided for in this act shall, by ordinance which shall be irrepealable, provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such bonds, as the same falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal thereof within twenty years from the date of contracting the same. Provided, That if any municipality shall have the authority under any special act to issue its bonds, the amount of the bonds issued under the special act shall be first deducted, and there shall only be issued under the special act shall bonds as shall not exceed the limit provided in this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

tion of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Has this bill been reported by the committee?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; and it was also favorably reported in the last Congress and passed the House at that time.

Mr. PAYNE. There was so much confusion that it was difficult to hear the reading of the bill. I see that the bill limits the amount of bonds to be issued for this particular purpose. Does it limit the whole amount of bonds to be issued by the municipality for any purpose?

mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The bill provides that the bonds to be issued under it shall not exceed 5 mills on the dollar.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the total of bonds of any character?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are no other bonds authorized to be issued.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no law authorizing the issue of bonds,

Mr. PAYNE. There is no law authorizing the issue of bonds, not even a special act for any of these towns?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. None at all. This is the first bill of that kind that ever passed the House. This passed the last House and went to the Senate, but they did not have time to act

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman to say that the bill has been reported by the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was reported in the last Congress and passed the House, and has been again reported in this House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Lacey], from the Committee or Indian Affairs. mittee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; the bill has been reported in this Congress.
Mr. MADDOX. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Is the amount of bonds to be issued by any municipality limited?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is limited to 5 mills on the dollar of the taxable property within the incorporated limits of the town.

Mr. MADDOX. What is the provision for the payment of the

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The last clause of the bill, section provides that all the taxable property of the town shall be which is going on between gentlemen over on the other side.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I say the last section provides for the payment of the bonds by the levy of a tax on all the taxable property within the city or town.

Mr. PAYNE. There is some misunderstanding over here about the reply of the gentleman from Texas. He is understood to have replied that the bill was reported by a committee in the last Congress, and that it passed the House in the last Congress. I ask the gentleman if it has been reported by any committee in this

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; it has been reported by the centleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], from the Committee on Indian Affairs, in this Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. That is the way I understood the gentleman, but other gentlemen did not so understand him.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is has been twice reported—once

Mr. LACEY. I suggest to my friend that he read the part of the bill which limits the indebtedness. It is very brief and will answer the question.

Mr. MADDOX. What I wish to know is what provision is made for the payment of the bonds.

Mr. LACEY. There is a provision for that also. If the gentleman in charge of the bill will read this provision and the other one, which are both very short, they will answer the question better than any verbal statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The provision limiting the issue is Such bonds not to exceed an amount the interest on which at 5 per cent per annum would be liquidated by a tax of 5 mills upon the dollar of the valuation of the taxable property in such city or town, to be ascertained by the last assessment for purposes of taxation.

That is the provision limiting it to 5 mills on the dollar. Now, the last paragraph of the bill reads as follows:

That if any municipality shall have the authority under any special act to issue its bonds, the amount of the bonds issued under the special act shall be first deducted, and there shall only be issued under this act such additional bonds as shall not exceed the limit provided in this act.

That is, the 5-mill limit. The previous section is this:

That any municipality incurring any indebtedness for the purposes provided for in this act shall, by ordinance which shall be irrepealable, provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on such bonds, as the same falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal thereof within twenty years from the date of contracting the same.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, have you created a sinking fund?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This creates a sinking fund by levying an amount sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds each year, and then one-twentieth is set apart for the purpose of paying the principal at the end of twenty years.

Mr. MADDOX. That is all right; that is what I wished to know about

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is an absolute necessity for the passage of this bill. There is not a schoolhouse in any of the cities or towns in this Territory, and the rate of taxation there is low. There is a great demand for this bill. It was drafted by a committee of lawyers in convention assembled in South McAlester last year, and is well guarded in every respect.

I hope it will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MARSHAL'S BOND IN ALASKA.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the Senate bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2014) to increase the amount of the official bond to be furnished by the United States marshal for the district of Alaska, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 459 of the act of March 3, 1899, be amended so as to read: "That whenever the business of the courts in any division of the district of Alaska shall make it necessary, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, for the marshal for said division to furnish greater security than the official bond now required by law, a bond in a sum not to exceed $75,000 shall be given when required by the Attorney-General, who shall fix the amount thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.
Mr. LACEY. What is the amount of the present bond?
Mr. RAY of New York. The general law requires of marshals of the United States a bond not exceeding $40,000, which in the States in the near-by Territories is sufficient; but with Alaska the difficulty of communication is such and the infrequency of com-munication is such, that we frequently have to send more than munication is such, that we frequently have to send more than that amount of money in order to keep the courts running. The necessity for this law was recognized by statute formerly; but when we came to enact, first the criminal laws of Alaska and then the civil code of Alaska this provision was overlooked, so that now the Attorney-General can only require a $40,000 bond of the marshal. That territory has now been divided into three different districts. This bill passed the Senate without objection. The Attorney-General recommends it, urges it, and asks its passage. The bill was considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, by a full committee and is manimously reported by that commit by a full committee, and is unanimously reported by that commit tee. It is simply to care for the funds of the Government and enable the courts to be run expeditiously and to save expense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly

read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLESTON EXPOSITION.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 15, or rather an amendment to the House amendment to that joint resolution. I ask the Clerk to read the House amendment and the Senate amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a Senate joint resolution with a Senate amendment to the House amendment, and asks favorable consideration of the Senate amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

House amendment: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert: "That to reimburse the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition Company, at Charleston, S. C., for expenses heretofore incurred or that may be incurred up to June 1, 1902, on account of the United States Government exhibit at said exposition, for transportation, sleeping-car fares, subsistence of Government employees, freight, installation and care, construction of building occupied by the Fish Commission exhibit, and for compensation for floor space occupied by the Government exhibits other than of the Fish Commission in the exposition building, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed on vouchers presented by said exposition company and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The Senate amendment to the House amendment was read, as

Page 1, line 6, of said amendment, strike out "June 1, 1902," and insert: "the time of closing said exposition and incident thereto."

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this in no way changes the scope of the joint resolution as it passed the House with the House amendment. This amendment is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury for the better administration of the fund appropriated; and unless some gentleman desires a further explanation, I will simply move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion to concur was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table,

COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution:
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be authorized to have printed and bound all documents for the use of said committee that it may deem necessary in connection with subjects under consideration or to be considered by said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Lovering was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

BILLS NOT MARKED.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of members of the House to the fact that some members are inadvertently placing bills in the basket without noting their names on the bill, making it impossible for the Clerk to give due credit.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now

Mr. BARNEY. Will the gentlemen yield to me to ask unanimous consent for leave to print?
Mr. PAYNE. I withhold the motion.
Mr. BARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that ten days' leave to print be given to all gentlemen who spoke on the pension appropriation bill.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks uanimous consent for ten days' leave to print to all who spoke upon the pension appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.
Mr. PAYNE. I renew my motion.
The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and

GAZETTEER OF PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid hefore the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of War, which was read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 16, 1902.

Sir: There has been prepared in the Division of Insular Affairs of this Department during the course of the last year a Gazetteer of the Philippine Islands, containing information relative to the different islands and provinces, civil and military governments, facilities of transportation, cable and postal stations, and general information concerning all localities, compiled from all available official and other sources.

If this book could be printed it would probably be acknowledged as a valuable addition to the literature upon this subject, and its importance at this time might warrant its general distribution as a Congressional document rather than that the cost of its publication be charged to the limited allotment available for printing by the War Department.

Very respectfully,

Hon. Whiliam P. Frye,

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and printed.

Mr. LODGE. I think it had better go to the Committee on Printing. I understand that it transmits the Gazetteer of the Philippine Islands, which has been prepared. That is a work of considerable magnitude, and I think the Committee on Printing ought to report upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

House joint resolution No. 6, a joint resolution and memorial requesting the Congress of the United States to treat with the Indians for the cession and opening for white settlement and free homestead entry all that portion of the Rosebud Indian Reservation lying within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak.

the Rosebud Indian Reservation lying within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the legislature of South Dakota, the senate concurring: Whereas there is in the organized portion of Gregory County, S. Dak., about 6 Congressional townships, said tract being too small in area, population, and assessed valuation to successfully maintain a county government without causing such government to become unduly burdensome; and

Whereas there is also within the boundaries of said Gregory County, S. Dak., about 23 Congressional townships of agricultural land which forms a part of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, and upon which are living a few Indians who have all taken their allotments in severalty; and

Whereas it is understood that the Indians are willing for a reasonable compensation to cede all that portion of the reservation to the Government; and

Whereas the ceding of said portion of the reservation to the Government would still leave a sufficiently large and suitable territory to meet all the requirements of an Indian reservation, while at the same time the ceding and opening to white settlers of all that portion of said reservation above referred to would add to the productive farming land of the State, enlarge the area of Gregory County to a proper and desirable size, and greatly lessen the expense of maintaining the government of said county; Therefore, be it Resolved, That we respectfully petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States to treat with the Indians at the earliest practicable date for the cession of all that portion of the Rosebud Indian Reservation lying within the boundaries of Gregory County, S. Dak., and that said tract be open to free homestead entry by white settlers; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to effect the object prayed for in this memorial; and the secretary of state is hereby instructed to forward copies of this memorial to our

MESSENGER FOR THE COMMITTEE ON COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. MITCHELL. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coast Defenses be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $1,440 per annum, until otherwise provided by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, it is perhaps ungracious to suggest that the clerical and other official force of the Senate is being very rapidly increased, and that without the consideration of any committee as to whether it should be so in-We have had in the last few weeks several resolutions-I think four or five—appointing additional messengers to committees. Such resolutions are referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee thinks it has no jurisdiction to determine whether such officers should be appointed, but simply the question as to whether there is money enough in the contingent fund with which to pay them. I suppose it to be a fact that the clerical and other official force of the Senate costs more money than the salaries and mileage of Senators. I do not know in reference to the necessity which exists as to this particular resolution, but I do feel that it is my duty to make these suggestions here, so that the meaning the market may be continued at least as to the precessity for the matter may be scrutinized, at least, as to the necessity for such appointments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I should like to make a few remarks on the resolution. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be first read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has that resolution just been introduced, or has it been reported by a committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is simply introduced now for reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate

Mr. COCKRELL. And not reported this morning?
Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all. The resolution was simply introduced by myself this morning for reference to the Committee troduced by myself this morning for reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all I want to know.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only desire to say, in answer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt], that I regret he did not see his way clear to put in the suggestion he has now made against this resolution a little earlier in the session when divers resolutions of the kind have been introduced and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I join with the Senator in expressing the hope that the Committee on Contingent Expenses, as I have no doubt they will, may carefully scrutinize the resolution and do just what they think is right in the matter

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should not have made the remarks I did if I had not been told by a member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses that that committee did not consider the propriety or the necessity for the appointment of additional clerical and official force when such resolutions were referred to them; that they thought that was beyond their jurisdiction; that the only question they considered was whether there was sufficient money in the contingent fund to provide for the payment of the additional officers. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gal-LINGER], who is on the Committee on Contingent Expenses, can tell me whether I am right or wrong about that.

If the Committee on Contingent Expenses would take jurisdiction of these resolutions and determine whether there is such a necessity for the appointment of new officers that it ought to be done, of course I should have nothing to say about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not hear the resolution read, but I presume it is in the usual form, providing for an additional clerk or messenger or some official connected with a committee The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] is partly right and partly wrong, so far as any utterance of mine is concerned. In the matter of investigations I have insisted that such propositions should first go to the committee having jurisdiction over the particular subject, and if the committee, as a committee, thought it was desirable that an investigation should be had, then the resolution should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, so as to present to us only the question as to whether or not there was money sufficient in the contingent fund to provide for the investigation. I think it would be wise if the same position was taken in reference to additional clerical help; that instead of one Senator asking for it, the particular committee should in some way make known to the Senate that the additional help was required.

Not being chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and occupying the position of acting chairman only in the absence of the chairman, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones], I do not feel like stating to-day how much of a burden is already imposed upon the contingent fund in the matter of additional clerks and messengers to committees. I have held that it was a grievance, and that there ought to be some remedy for it; but others have not agreed with me; the Senate has not agreed with me, certainly, and so I shall not raise that question to-day, but I think we ought to weigh very carefully the question of the necessity of additional help whenever it is asked for. I venture to repeat that I think the committee itself, rather than the chairman or any individual member of the committee, should ask for such additional help.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator if the Committee on Contingent Expenses considers it a part of its duty, upon the reference of such a resolution, to consider the necessity for the additional force, or whether it confines itself simply to the question of whether, after an examination of the accounts, the contingent fund is adequate for the payment of the additional employees

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say frankly that my mf. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say frankly that my individual view has been that the responsibility of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate ceased when it determined the simple fact as to whether or not there was money enough to meet any charge that was placed upon the contingent fund by virtue of a resolution passed by this body.

Mr. SPOONER. Do the Senator and the committee intend that the Senate shall understand that when a resolution of this character is favorably reported it covers the two points, first, whether there is adequate money in the contingent fund, and, second, that upon the merits of the proposition the resolution should be adopted, or only the first point?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has me at a disadvantage, inasmuch as I am not chairman of that committee; but I think I masmuch as I am not chairman of that committee; but I think I am safe in saying that during my service on that committee the committee has had very few sessions; it has been called to meet as a committee very few times. The chairman of the committee has rather taken upon himself this matter, oftentimes conferring on the floor with other members of the committee; but I do not know precisely what attitude the chairman would assume on the question raised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooners].

I have not felt that it was the function or the duty of this committee to enter into any investigation as to the precessity for a mittee to enter into any investigation as to the necessity for a particular expenditure after the Senate had sent a resolution to that committee. We have sometimes made inquiry-I have myself—of chairmen of committees who are asking for additional help, and we have taken the word of the chairmen that the help was needed. That is as far as I can go in answering the Senator's question.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I suppose if a similar resolution were introduced as to every committee of this body and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate found there was sufficient money in the contingent fund of the Treasury the resolution would be reported back favorably?

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of what has taken place in this body during the past few years, I will say to the Senator and to the Senate what I have said in my individual and private capacity, that, in my judgment, the time is rapidly approaching when every committee of this body will ask for additional help, and that burden will be imposed upon the contingent fund. There has been no denial of any such request yet made so far as I know. Mr. SPOONER. I have no purpose at all to antagonize the resolution introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I know him very well, and I know him well enough to believe—he is an old Senator of great experience and great ability—that he would not introduce such a resolution unless he thought his committee needed the services; but I agree entirely with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] that such resolutions should not be passed as necticut [Mr. Platt] that such resolutions should not be passed as a matter of course simply upon the finding of the committee, of which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger] is a member, that there is adequate money in the contingent fund of the Senate. I think there ought to be some committee of this body—that question having been determined—to pass upon the merits of the proposition, otherwise we shall have every committee, large and small, important and unimportant, with a messenger added to the rolls of the Senate.

I believe it is true that the Senate as a body has considered a report by this committee as covering both propositions; and I believe it is true also, from what the Senator from New Hampshire says, that the merits of the question, the necessity for the additional employee, has not been considered by this committee. I think the Senator from Connecticut is altogether right; and unless the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is to consider it a part of its duty to pass not only upon the question as to whether there is sufficient money in the contingent fund, but is also to consider and pass upon the merits of the proposition, I shall move that such resolutions be referred, before they are acted upon by the Senate, to the Committee on Rules or some other committee.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think the present method of dealing with this subject is exactly the proper one. These are propositions which already come from a committee. They say they want a messenger. I understand practically the Senator they want a messenger. I understand practically the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Mitchell] represents his committee in his resolution. I do not think, if any committee wants a messenger, that the question should be referred to some other committee of equal, but not superior, dignity, or that it should go to the Committee on Rules without any consideration by the Senate. They make their report, as I understand, not undertaking—I will not say not presuming to undertake—to review the judgment of the committee by whom the request is made. Then the matter is up before the Senate, and is to be discussed upon its merits. Supperore the Senate, and is to be discussed upon its merits. Suppose the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Appropriations should want an additional messenger, I do not see how the Committee on Rules would have any better judgment than the committees immediately concerned as to what is wanted.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Plat] stated that this resolution and similar resolutions were not reported from a committee, but were introduced by the chairman of the committee, by a Senator, as other resolutions are other resolutions are.

Mr. HOAR. That is, I suppose, a mere formality. I take it, as a matter of course, the chairman of a committee asking for a messenger for that committee is presumed to represent that committee's desire.

Mr. GALLINGER. A single additional word, Mr. President. I regret that the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is not present to speak for himself.

Mr. Jones of Nevada entered the Chamber.
Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the chairman of the committee is now present, but I presume he is not informed of what has transpired here. I rose, however, to make an observation in a somewhat different line, which is that for the most part the law in providing messengers and excitent the most part the law in providing messengers and assistant clerks for committees has placed the amount of their salaries at $1,440. That is what the assistant clerks in most large committees of the Senate are getting. assistant clerks in most large committees of the Senate are getting. Recently Senators have introduced resolutions asking for assistant clerks, naming the amount of $1,800 a year; and such resolutions have been passed by the Senate. We have that absurdity, as I look upon it—a provision in the law for assistant clerks at $1,440, properly provided by statute, and a provision for an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund, passed upon a Senator's resolution at $1,800 a year. I have tried to remedy that discrepancy, but have not succeeded. I think the position which the committee has taken for the most part has been that if a chairman of a committee asks for additional help the presumption is that the committee needs the help, and it is granted.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing really before the Senate for debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. My resolution has been under discussion.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the Senator will be heard

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as my resolution has got something of a black eye before its reference to the committee, without any intention, as a matter of course, upon the part of any Senator to give it a black eye, I simply desire to make a remark, so that that may also go to the committee.

There are some of us new Senators who are not so fortunate as some of the older Senators. We are located at a disadvantage to a certain extent—I refer to our committee rooms. Some of us— not myself, however, but some of my associates—are located in the Maltby Building, separated some distance from the Capitol. In company with some other equally good Senators, I am located in the cellar, as I call it—the terrace. That room, although a very nice room, is somewhat inconvenient; and so in communicating with the Sergeant-at-Arms, with the Postmaster, and with the various other officials, it is necessary, it seems to us, that we should have a messenger for our committee. That is all we ask. The committee as at present organized has no messenger. If we desire to send for a book or to send a telephonic or telegraphic message, we have to wait an unnecessarily long time. So it has occurred to myself, as well as to other members of the committee with whom I have discussed the matter, that we perhaps ought to have one messenger.

Now, I ask that the Committee on Contingent Expenses shall consider the matter. So far as the Committee on Rules is conconsider the matter. So far as the Committee on Rules is concerned, I do not think they have jurisdiction of it, with all due respect to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Sponer,], the chairman of that committee. I think it is a matter which rests entirely with the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If they should think, under the circumstances, that our committee is not entitled to a messenger, of course we shall make no complaint; it will be all right, but if they should agree with us in beliging we could be right; but if they should agree with us in believing we ought to have a messenger, that would be all right.

The President of the United States.

The President of the United States.

Sir: The Isthmian Canal Commission has the honor to submit the following report upon the proposition of the New Panama Canal Company to sell and dispose of all its rights, property, and unfinished work to the United States for $40,000,000.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the New Panama Canal Company held on the 21st of December last full power was given to the board of directors of the company to negotiate for the transfer of its property, concessions, and unfinished work to the United States, its action to be subject to formal ratification by the stockholders. In accordance with this action the board indicated its desire, through its representative in this city, to offer a proposition to make such transfer to the United States for the price mentioned. Thereupon by your oral direction the president of the Commission conferred with Mr. Edouard Lampre, secretary-general of the New Panama Canal Company. He also received several cablegrams from Mr. Marius Bo, the newly chosen president of the company in Paris. The results of these conferences and communications have been considered at a meeting of the Commission called for that purpose.

chosen president of the company and communications have been considered at a meeting of the Commission called for that purpose.

The first cablegram was dated in Paris on the 4th of January, and it stated that the company was ready to transfer to the United States its property and concessions for $40,000,000, and that the offer would remain open until the 4th of March, 1963. As it was not clear whether this offer included all the property of the company, further correspondence ensued, and it was made clear that the proposition was intended to cover the entire property of the company upon the Isthmus of Panama, all the stock of the Panama Railroad Company held for its use and benefit, and the maps, plans, archives, and records in Paris.

A communication and explanatory documents, duly certified, containing a fuller statement than is embraced in the cablegrams, but to the same effect, are on their way to the United States by mail, and copies of them have been deposited with the ambassador of the United States in Paris, who has acknowledged their receipt by cable to the Secretary of State.

The cablegrams received are as fellows:

Betury 2. Washington:

Inform Admiral Walker immediately, and without awaiting Lampre's arrival, that the company declares itself ready to transfer to the Government of the United States, on payment of $40,000,000, its properties and concessions, estimated at that amount by the Isthmian Canal Commission in its last report, page 103, in conformity with the terms and conditions of the estimates of said report.

Admiral WALKER,
President Isthmian Canal Commission,
Corcoran Building, Washington: The New Panama Canal Company declares that it is ready to accept for the totality, without exception, of its property and rights on the Isthmus the amount of $40,000,000, the above offer to remain in force up to March 4, 1903.

President Isthmian Canal Commission,

PARIS, January 14, 1902-9.45 p. m.

Admiral WALKER,
President Isthmian Canal Commission,
Corcoran Building, Washington: We send by mail letter confirming cable 11th January, and, under registered package, judgment August 2, agreement with liquidator, and three extracts showing powers of board. All these documents are certified to by the United States consulate-general.

Showing powers of board. All these documents are certified to by the United States consulate-general.

BO, President of the Board.

The "totality, without exception, of its property and rights on the Isthmus," mentioned in the cablegram of January 9, includes the following classes of property:

1. Lands not built on.—There are 55 parcels of land to which the title rests in the canal company, amounting to about 30,000 acres, which, with the lands belonging to the railroad company, cover nearly all of the ground required for the actual construction of the canal. Some additional land must be acquired for the construction of the lakes at Bohio and Alhajuela and for the outflow from the Gigante Spillway, these additional lands being at present of little value.

Under the law of Colombia, dated December 10, 1890, the canal company became entitled to 250,000 hectares (about 625,000 acres) of the land grant provided for in the original Wyse concession. These lands have never been delimited and the company has not actually taken possession of them, but the right to them would pass to the United States. In case the United States should not wish to take and hold these lands, it might relinquish the right in favor of Colombia in the negotiations with that Government for new treaty rights.

2. Buildings.—There are scheduled 2,431 buildings, divided among 47 subclassifications, used for offices, quarters, storehouses, hospitals, shops, stables, and miscellaneous purposes. Among them are two large permanent buildings in Panama, one used as the headquarters residence and the other as the general office, large general hospitals at Colon and Panama, and several important buildings at Colon. These buildings are furnished.

3. Plant.—There is an immense amount of machinery, consisting of floating plant (tugs, launches, dredges, etc.) and spare parts, with 17 subclassificationery, surgical and medical outfit, and miscellaneous supplies covering thousands of items.

4. Work done.—The excavation already accomplished upon the main can temporary diversion of the Panama Railroad has been made at the Culebra cut, which also must be considered. Using the same classification of materials and the same unit prices as in the other estimates, with the 20 per cent added for contingencies, the value of the work done is found to be:

5. Panama Railroad.—Of the existing 70,000 shares of the Panama Railroad the canal company will transfer to the United States all but about 1,100 shares. These latter are held by a few individuals residing in various parts of the United States and in Europe. As it will not be the policy of the United States to so manage the railroad as to secure a large revenue, it is probable that the holders of these shares will in time find it to their interest to dispose of them at the price fixed by the Commission for the other shares, viz, their par value. At par the value of the 68,803 shares to be transferred to the United States by the canal company is $6,885,300.

Against this property are mortgage bonds to the amount of $3,439,000. Of this amount the company owns $671,000, which it has pledged as collateral for its debt to the Panama Canal Company described below, and it also holds in its treasury $1,024,000 subject to sale or cancellation, leaving outstanding in the hands of the public $1,504,000. The bonds bear 44 per cent interest.

There are outstanding also $996,6006 be per cent sinking-fund subsidy bonds, but this liability is an amortization of the annual payment of $225,000 due the Colombian Government under its concession for the period ending November 1, 1210.

The railroad company owes $986,918 to the Panama Canal Company, mainly on account of the construction of the pier at La Boca.

Its total liabilities, therefore, are $2,490,918, not counting the sinking-fund subsidy bonds, for which the Colombian Government has received the benefit and for which it should make allowance to the United States in the negotiations for treaty rights.

Its cash assets January 15, 1902, were $438,569,33.

It owns three passenger and freight steamers of American registry, the Allianca, Advance, and France, of approximately 2,000 tons net each, which together with a chartered steamer and freight steamers of American registry between San Francisco and Panama. These ste

In reciting its conclusions in the report dated November 16, 1901, this Commission stated that the selection of the most feasible and practicable route must be made between the Nicaragua and Panama locations, adopting a plan of canal with locks in each case. It concluded that the water-supply features were satisfactory on both lines; that both dams, by which the summit levels would be sustained, were practicable, the advantage being in favor of the Conchuda dam at Nicaragua; that the plan of regulating the summit level was practicable in each case, though less simple on the Nicaragua route than on the Panama; that the present means of transportation were inadequate on the Nicaragua route, while a well-equipped railroad was in operation along the entire length of the Panama route; that there are now no natural harbors at Nicaragua, while serviceable ones exist at both ends of the Panama route, and although with the completion of the harbors as planned one route would have little advantage over the other, the balance was probably in favor of Panama; that owing to the absence of harbors and railroads the period of preparation at Nicaragua would be twice that at Panama.

It was also the sense of the Commission that the total time required for the construction of the canal by the Panama route would be ten years, and eight years by the Nicaragua route, with a greater probability of exigencies causing delays on the latter than on the former.

The estimated cost of constructing the Nicaragua Canal is $45,630,704 more than the cost of completing the Panama canal.

The estimated annual cost of maintenance and operation is $1,300,000 greater at Nicaragua than at Panama.

The Panama route would be 184.6 miles shorter than the Nicaragua route from sea to sea, with fewer locks and less curvature both in degrees and miles. The estimated time for a deep-draft vessel to p the west coast of South America the Panama route has the advantage of about one day. The trade of the western coast of South America is a very important one, which has hitherto been in European hands.

The Panama route is an old highway of commerce, along which no considerable industrial development is likely to occur. During the construction of a canal on the Nicaragua route business relations would be established with Costa Rica and Nicaragua which would be likely to continue. Existing conditions indicate hygienic advantages at Nicaragua, though equally effective sanitary measures must be taken in both cases.

The offer received from the New Panama Canal Company to convey all its property, including all its interest in the Panama Railroad, to the United States will make the estimated cost of the two canals as follows:

Nicaragua Panama

The transfer would give title to all the land now held by both the Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railroad Company, which covers nearly all lands required for the construction of the canal. The land held by private parties at Nicaragua must be acquired, and its acquisition may prove expensive.

The question whether the New Panama Canal Company can make to a purcious are a valid title to the property formerly belonging to the old company, its predecessor, has been considered and answered in the former reports of the Commission, but in view of its importance in connection with the present offer the results of the investigation made will be again presented.

with the present offer the results of the investigation made will be again presented.

The old company, in addition to its canal property acquired under its concession from the Colombian Government, owned nearly all of the shares of the Panama Railroad Company. By purchasing these it obtained the control of the concession under which the road had been built. The latter concession will continue in force until 1966; the canal concession is to run for ninety-nine years from the day on which the canal shall be opened for public service, and the date fixed for this in the concession, according to its latest extension, is October 31, 1910. When these periods expire the different properties are to belong absolutely to Colombia, without compensation, and the Government is under no obligation to extend either concession.

The canal company is absolutely prohibited to cede or mortgage its rights, under any consideration whatever, to any nation or foreign government under penalty of forfeiture. The contract with the railroad company contains a like prohibition, and declares further that the pain of forfeiture will be incurred by the mere act of attempting to cede or transfer its privilege to a foreign government, and such an act is declared absolutely null and of no value and effect.

But for the purpose of permitting the New Panama Canal Company to be incurred by the mere act of attempting to cede or transfer its privilege to a foreign government, and such an act is declared absolutely null and of no value and effect.

But for the purpose of permitting the New Panama Canal Company to enter upon the negotiations which have resulted in the present offer, Colombia has waived these prohibitions and has authorized the company to treat directly with the United States, with a view to the use and occupation of the territory of, the former for canal purposes if our Government should select the Panama route for an isthmian canal.

After the old company failed a liquidator was appointed by the French court to take charge of its property and affairs. When the new company was formed he was authorized to contribute to it the rights, privileges, plans, documents, plant, and unfinished work in his hands and under his control, and in consideration of this grant he was to receive 60 per cent of the net profits of the enterprise after deducting all expenses, charges, and stipulated dividends to be distributed by him among the parties in interest.

This interest of the old company is still under the protection of the liquidator and he must be a party to any arrangement that may be entered into for a sale and conveyance of the property, and as he derives his authority from the tribunal that appointed him, his action requires the approval and confirmation of the court.

The papers before the Commission show that the liquidator has agreed to the proposition and that he is acting under judicial authority.

A deed to the property executed by the canal company and the liquidator requires the approval of the Government of Colombia because of the prohibition already referred to in the concessions and for the further reason that the Republic owns 50,000 shares of 100 francs each of the stock of the company, full paid, of which it can not be deprived without its consent.

Such a transfer of title thus approved would give to the United States the same right, title, and interest in the

be agreed upon free from all embarrassment with reference to past transactions.

The Commission has no power to enter upon negotiations for the arrangement of these matters. They belong to the treaty-making power; but the acceptance of the terms offered by the New Panama Canal Company should be conditioned upon their satisfactory adjustment.

The advantages of the two canal routes have been restated according to the findings of the former report. There has been no change in the views of the Commission with reference to any of these conclusions then reached, but the new proposition submitted by the New Panama Canal Company makes a reduction of nearly $70,000,000 in the cost of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, according to the estimates contained in the former report, and with this reduction a canal can be there constructed for more than $5,50,000 less than through Nicaragua. The unreasonable sum asked for the property and rights of the New Panama Canal Company when the Commission reached its former conclusion overbalanced the advantages of that route, but now that the estimates by the two routes have been nearly equalized the Commission can form its judgment by weighing the advantages of each and determining which is the more practicable and feasible.

There is, however, one important matter which can not enter into its determination, but which may in the end control the action of the United States. Reference is made to the disposition of the Governments whose territory is necessary for the construction and operation of an isthmian canal. It must be assumed by the Commission that Colombia will exercise the same fairness and liberality if the Panama route is determined upon that have been expected of Nicaragua and Costa Rica should the Nicaragua route be preferred.

After considering the changed conditions that now exist and all the facts and circumstances upon which its present judgment must be began to the construction of the combination of the canada the construction of the combination of the property of

After considering the changed conditions that now exist and all the facts and circumstances upon which its present judgment must be based, the Commission is of the opinion that "the most practicable and feasible route" for an isthmian canal, to be "under the control, management, and ownership of the United States," is that known as the Panama route.

We have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants, with the request of the Senate, I ask that the vote by which it was passed be reconsidered, and then that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator further asks that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be so referred.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. McKenney, the enrolling clerk of the House, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 2044) to increase the amount of the official bond to be furnished by the United States marshal for the district of Alaska in certain cases; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 15) to pay the expenses of the United States Government exhibit at the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition, in the city of Charleston, county of Charleston, State of South Carolina, during the years 1901 and PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. NELSON. Is the morning business closed, Mr. President?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.
Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—
Mr. MASON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment to make personal statement?

a personal statement?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I desire to make a personal statement to go into the Record, which is not customary so far as I am concerned, for, as a rule, I do not believe in encumbering the Record; but a large number of newspapers, in my State and elsewhere, have stated within the past few weeks that I, as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, was opposing rural free delivery, and that, as chairman, I would oppose it. It is only fair to me to say, as I have no newspaper to edit and can only participate in this sparkling publication known as the Congressional Record, what my colleagues on the committee all know, that for years I have endeavored to increase and better that service, and am now urging the committee to report in favor of an increased appropriation.

Another statement is being made, which is not correct, a denial of which I desire this morning to enter as an editorial in the RECORD. The statement is to the effect that I had taken part against the laboring people by having printed a pamphlet on Chinese exclusion. I did in that case as every Senator does. I looked through the pamphlet, and I saw in a general way there were letters and communications signed by ex-Presidents and others. I was informed by my correspondent that it was an argument against continued Chinese exclusion, and as I favor now, for I do favored in the past, the continuance of the present law—for I do favor the continuance of the present law, unless some better one or one more just and equitable for the benefit of this country be passed—and desiring that the committee of which I am a member should have the advantage and benefit of all the views upon both sides of the question, in the usual and customary way, I introduced the paper and asked to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Of course I favor the continuance, as I said before, of the present

Chinese law, unless some better and fairer law can be enacted; but of course in the interest of fair play I desired both sides to be heard before the committee of which I am a member. For that reason I had the paper printed and referred to the committee.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (S. 569) to establish the department of commerce.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire this morning briefly to correct some misapprehensions which seem to exist in reference to this bill.

When the bill was first called up for consideration I did not apprehend that there would be any serious objection to it from any direction, but from remarks which have been made by some Senators while the bill has been up, I have been led to believe that there are some parts of the measure which are not fully understood.

We find, on looking over the Executive Departments of the We find, on looking over the Executive Departments of the Government, that the only industrial interests of the country which are under the administration, guidance, direction, and protection, if I may use that phase, of an Executive Department are our great agricultural interests. They have for years had the Department of Agriculture, which has looked after the agricultural interests of the country in a very practical, useful, and comprehensive manner.

I have no doubt it is the consensus of opinion in this country that that Department has performed a most useful and necessary function for our agricultural interests.

Now, if we look abroad in other directions, through the industrial fields; if we look at our commerce, foreign and inland; if we look at our great manufacturing industries, our shipping industries, and our fishing industries, and all through the great industries of the country, we find that those several industries and interests have no governmental department to which they can look for guidance, advice, and administrative care.

In every other country of any consequence, with but few exceptions every even group the smaller countries they are also advent to the smaller countries.

tions, even among the smaller countries, there is a department similar to that proposed in this bill. Every country has felt the need and the necessity for such an administrative department to look after its commercial and industrial interests. One of the latest countries to act on this principle is Russia. Until two years ago the administration of the commercial, manufacturing, and industrial interests of Russia was a part of the finance department of that country, which is the same as the Department of the Treasury in this country.

In addition to this there has been a greater demand throughout the industrial and commercial world for the establishment of such a department and for this legislation than there has been for any other bill I can recall which has been pending before Congress. The Committee on Commerce have been overwhelmed with resolutions, petitions, and memorials from commercial bodies, manufacturing bodies, shipping interests, and other industrial interests all over this broad land, East, West, North, and South. I have had some little experience in legislation, although not so much as many other Senators here, and yet I can say that in my experience I know of no bill which has had such hearty support and such great interest taken in it throughout the country as has this great bill.

Now this bill aims—and that is its purpose—to establish an executive department, the duty of which shall be to foster, promote, and develop commercial manufacturing, fishery, shipping, and all other great industries of this country. We find on looking through the several departments of this Government that there are some bureaus, divisions, and branches of the service scattered around in a heterogenous manner that are in part devoted to some of the work involved in this bill, but they are scattered around in such a manner that they can not work in unison or in harmony or to a common purpose and end.

It is intended by this bill to equip the proposed department with all those bureaus and branches of the public service that relate to these subjects—that relate to the commercial interests of the country; that relate to the manufacturing interests of the country; that relate to the shipping interests of the country; that re-late to the labor and immigration interests of the country; and that relate to the fishing industry of the country.

Now, it has been said that the effect of this bill will be to withdraw a great many bureaus from other departments and to overload the proposed department and to make it the great department of Government. Mr. President, that is founded on a misapprehension and a misunderstanding of the case. The two great departments of the Government which to-day are overcrowded and have more work than they ought to do, and work of a disconnected and inharmonious character, are the Treasury Department and the Interior Department. A year ago, when I carefully looked up the subject by making inquiries at the Department, the Treasury Department had a force of 4,881 employees, while the Interior Department had 4,440 employees. When I speak of the Treasury Department had a force of 4,881 employees, while the Interior Department had 4,440 employees. When I speak of employees, I mean the employees who are working in the several bureaus in Washington. The other departments have but a minor force—the Department of Justice only 141, the Navy Department 324, the State Department 95, the Post-Office Department of the Was Department 90, the Was Department 9 ment 697, the Agricultural Department 804, the War Department 1,787—while each of the other departments, the Treasury and the Interior Department, has a larger force than all the other departments combined.

Now, look at the character of those departments. Take, for instance, the Treasury Department. The chief scope and purpose of that Department is to take charge of the fiscal and financial operations of the Government; to collect the revenue from cusoperations of the Government; to collect the revenue from customs and internal revenue; to disburse that revenue for all public purposes; to take charge of our currency, of the coinage, of our national debt, and of all that pertains to the fiscal and financial operations of the Government. As its name implies, it is the Treasury Department, or what they call in other governments the finance department, of the Government.

Now, in the course of time that Department has been lumbered up with a lot of matters foreign to its main purpose. The Department of the Treasury has attached to it the Life-Saving Service, the Light-House Board, the Marine-Hospital Service, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, the Bureau of Navigation, the United States Shipping Commissioners, the Bureau of Immigration, the Bureau of Statistics, and the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Now, all these branches of the public service, the titles of which

Now, an these branches of the public service, the these of which I have read, have no relevancy to or bearing upon the financial or fiscal administration of the Government. They have charge of matters each and all of which peculiarly appertain to commerce and navigation, to the industrial interests of this country, and they ought not to be attached to a department charged with the fourth of the Government.

fiscal affairs of the Government.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAIRBANKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I perceive the force of the suggestion which the Senator from Minnesota is making. It has struck me in reading over the list of these different bureaus in the Treasury Depart-

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I could, before he asks the question, give him a little supplemental information which would make his question more germane, I think.

Mr. HALE. I was merely going to ask why all these branches should be taken out and put in a new department—the Light-House Service, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, the Shipping Commissioners, etc., while the Revenue-Cutter Service was left with the Treasury Department?

Mr. NELSON. My answer to that is this, and the Senator can see the force of it: The Revenue-Marine Service aids in the colsee the force of it. The Revenue-Marine Service and in the collection of our revenue on water. It pertains to the fiscal management of the Government. It is the duty of that service to look after smuggling by water. We have along our international boundary a lot of Treasury agents looking after smuggling by land, and the Revenue-Cutter Service is that branch of the service which look after these matters of Treasury agents looking after the service with the look after the service water if I was not the service with the service water if I was not the service water in the service was not the se which looks after those matters on water, if I may use that expression. That is why. It appertains peculiarly to the collection of our revenue, and has to protect and preserve it from smuggling and other things. Hence we find that revenue cutters in all our ports and harbors frequently run out to sea and meet vessels coming into port, and revenue officers are immediately put on board the great Atlantic liners.

I think the Senator will agree with me, in view of the fact that this service has peculiar charge of the branch of the service which relates to the collection of the custom revenues, that it should belong to the department of the Government charged with that

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator. I supposed that would be the answer given. But I think it applies also to some of the other services

Mr. NELSON. I will take them up more in detail later. Mr. HALE. But the Senator is going on, and I will wait until he is at leisure

Mr. NELSON. Now, from a remark made by the honorable Senator from Maine the other day, I inferred that he thought there was very little left for the Treasury Department. I will call his attention, if he has the report of the committee. 4, where he will find the fact stated, that taking these bureaus and divisions out of the Treasury Department, as the bill proposes, the Treasury Department will still be left with the following bureaus and divisions of the public service; and if the Senator will listen, he will see what a multitude they are:

Treasurer of the United States, Director of the Mint, Comptroller of the Currency, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Division of Public Moneys, Division of Loans and Currency, Secret Service Division, Comptroller of the Treasury, Register of the Treasury, Auditor for the Treasury Department, Auditor for the War Department, Auditor for the Interior Department, Auditor for the Navy Department, Auditor for the State and other Departments, Auditor for the Post-Office Department, national-bank redemption agencies, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Commissioner of Customs, and the Revenue-Cutter Service.

All those bureaus will remain in the Treasury Department, and it will have a great and immense force.

Now, let me call the Senator's attention to the character of the divisions of the service which it is proposed to transfer to the new department from the Treasury Department. We transfer, first of all, the Bureau of Navigation, because it relates to the shipping industries of the country. In connection with it we transfer the Life-Saving Service and the Light-House Board. Now, a mere Life-Saving Service and the Light-House Board. Now, a mere inspection—and it needs no argument, for everyone can see at a glance—shows that the Life-Saving Service and the Light-House Board all pertain to our shipping interests. They relate to matters of navigation. They have no bearing on or relevancy to any of the chief duties vested in the Treasury Department. They have no bearing upon the financial or fiscal operations of the Government. They bear directly upon our shipping industries and indirectly upon our commercial interests so far as they are connected with our shipping industry.

The same is true of the Light-House Service and the Marine-Hospital Service. The latter service is charged with looking after the welfare of our sailors connected with our merchant marine. Why should that service remain with the Treasury Department? Why should not that be attached to the Department of Commerce and Industries?

Take the Steamboat-Inspection Service, engaged in inspecting Take the Steamboat-Inspection Service, engaged in inspecting our steamboats and seeing that they are safe—that they are properly licensed to navigate our waters. Why should the Treasury Department be charged with that duty, and is not that a duty which peculiarly pertains to the province of commerce and to our shipping industries? The same is true of the United States shipping commissioners, who have charge and look after the welfare of our sailors in their taking service on board of vessels.

Now, take the Bureau of Immigration. It does not relate to any of the fiscal and financial affairs of the Government, but to the industrial welfare of the nation. It has a bearing upon the interests of the laboring man. It has a bearing upon our manu-interests of the laboring man. It has a bearing upon our manufacturing industries and all the industries of the country. There ought to be under the department of commerce, if anything ought to be under that department, the question of passing upon and executing our immigration laws and examining immigrants who come to our shores.

Mr. HALE. How about the United States Coast and Geodetic

Mr. NELSON. I have this to say about that department: The Coast and Geodetic Survey was established years ago, and it was, when first established, assigned to the Treasury Department. Then the question came up, and it has been a question off and on, as to whether it ought not to be assigned to the Navy Department. In 1843 Congress provided by act (March 3, 1843) for an examination and settlement of the matter. That act authorized a board to submit a plan for the approval of the President. The board consisted of the Superintendent of the Survey, two of his civilian assistants, four officers of the Army, and two of the Navy. This board resolved that inasmuch as the object and purpose of the survey of the coasts refer particularly to the commercial interests of the courty it should be under the control of the Treasmy. Department of the provided that army and paralled fiftees.

ury Department. It provided that army and naval officers, as well as civilians, should participate in the work.

During the Mexican war all of the military officers who were connected with the work were withdrawn and sent to the front, and at the commencement of the civil war the same took place. and at the commencement of the civil war the same took place. All the military and naval officers were withdrawn from this service and sent into active service. The same took place during the Spanish war. We find, by looking at the record of the operations of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, that while they had officers of the Army and officers of the Navy participating in the work, every time there has been a war—the war with Mexico, the civil was the Spanish way the service. work, every time there has been a war—the war with Mexico, the civil war, and the Spanish war—those officers have been withdrawn from the service and the work has been committed to civilian employees, and the work has been done well.

Now, what is the chief work of that Bureau? It is to examine the waters of our seacoasts as far as tidewater and to sound those and chart them and to prepare the charts for purposes of naviga-tion. Our merchant marine is more interested in their work than is any other department of our industrial life, and the duties of the civilian employees are first of all to go in their boats along the coast and make soundings of the depths of the harbors and of the entrance to harbors and of our coasts in the interests of navigation. Now, no one can dispute that civilians are as competent to perform that work as any naval man or military man. After that work has been done in the field, after the soundings have been made and the depths of our waters along the coast have been ascertained from an actual survey on the ground, then the work is platted and charted, and those charts are distributed to the different vessels in our merchant marine. There is no occasion, in my judgment, to put that upon, and it should not be put upon, the Navy Department of the Government.

The Navy Department, especially in time of war, has need for all of its naval officers for its work. They are educated for that purpose, and we need them for that work. Our experience in the past has demonstrated that whenever we had a war Army and Navy men connected with that work have been withdrawn from the service and have been put into the active service, and the work has been left to civilian employees. Inasmuch as this service pertains to our shipping and the welfare of our shipping interests and our merchant marine, I say appropriately and necessarily it belongs to the department of commerce.

I wish to call attention, further, in this connection to the fact that the Navy Department has an office called the Hydrographic Office, which was established originally as a depot for the collection of and the supplying of the Navy with charts and instruments. The main work of that office is to secure charts of surveys by foreign governments, and to reprint them and furnish them to our Navy. They have a work of their own. They do a work that the Coast and Geodetic Survey can not do. They gather information from foreign nations of surveys made in foreign harbors and along coast lines, get their charts, reprint those charts, and distribute them among our naval officers. So they are amply provided for in that branch of the service, and there is no occasion to make this department, which has nothing to do with that branch of it, a part of the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator about to leave this particular subject?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, in part, but I am coming back to it after-

Mr. HALE. When the matter was called up on Thursday I stated that I was getting some papers which would bear on the subject, and the Senator in charge of the bill said they had determined not to insist upon this remaining in the bill, but it would go back to the Treasury Department, so that the old controversy between that Department and the Navy Department might at any time be taken up as a separate measure. On looking the matter over I saw the force of that. I have no doubt the Senator proposes to do that. Therefore, I have not armed myself with the papers necessary if the contest were to be made for incorporating these duties into the Navy Department. If the Senator does that then that controversy will be taken up here. Senator does that, then that controversy will be taken up here-after between the two Departments as he indicated the other

Mr. NELSON. I may say, in this connection, if the Senator will allow me, that the committee as a committee took no action. Whatever I said and did the other day was rather more on my own responsibility; and after looking over the question carefully, I am satisfied in my own mind that the Coast and Geodetic Survey ought to belong to the department of commerce,

Mr. HALE. The Senator took the responsibility that a Senator does who is in charge of a bill. I wish he had told me that at the time, because he clearly made the proposition that he would move to strike that out and leave the service where it is and where it has been, and let the controversy come up afterwards. I supposed, of course, that that would be done, and have supposed so, and do now. I do not think the Senator will undertake to go back in any way upon the suggestion made at that time.

Mr. NELSON. The honorable Senator from Maine will remember that he at that time also indicated that he would move to amend and to attach this bureau to the Navy Department, so that the double question was, in a measure, pending.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly, technically pending, because the provision did not go out. That is what brought it up; but on the strength of the Senator's proposition I concluded not to go further and not to ask the Senate to consider the amendment, and I did not arm myself with the documents and papers. When the Senator got up this morning I supposed, of course, that he was going to move, as he did the other day, to strike that out. My amendment would go with it.

Mr. NELSON. I have taken some pains to ascertain the number of employees in the bureaus and divisions of the public service taken by this bill from the other departments and transferred to the department of commerce. I did this because it was claimed the other day that we were clipping the other departments and making this the great dominating department. I find, by looking up the records—and I will say to the Senator from Maine that I have taken the last legislative appropriation act in order to get the figures correct—that the number is as follows. I refer simply to the employees in the Government bureaus in Washington and not to those in the Government bureaus in Washington and not to those in the field. In the Life-Saving Service there are 29 employees who are transferred to this department by the pending bill; in the Light-House Board, 32; in the Marine-Hospital Service, 29; in the Steamboat-Inspection Service, 7; in the Bureau of Navigation, 21; in the Bureau of Immigration, 7; in the Bureau of Statistics, 37; in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, 124. This makes a total of 286 employees taken from the Treasury Department out of a total force of 4,595.

Now, take the Interior Department.
Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Gallinger in the chair).
Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.
Mr. PETTUS. I understood the Senator to consent at the last meeting that the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey should be taken out of the bill. Is it not stricken out?

No; it is not stricken out. It is still pending. What is the status of the provision? The amendment is still pending. It was not Mr. NELSON.

Mr. PETTUS.

Mr. NELSON. disposed of.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Before the Senator from Minnesota speaks of the Interior Department, I wish to assure him that I am in favor of the creation of a department of commerce, but may I ask if there are not many officials outside of Washington who are connected, for instance, with the Immigration Bureau?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; I have not taken them into account in the figures. I wish to say to the Senator that in figuring up the account of the Transport of the Connecticut.

the aggregate number of employees of the Treasury Department I only took the number of employees who are employed in bureaus in Washington.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. All the employees of the Immigration Bureau, whether employed here in Washington or elsewhere, would come under the control of the new department, would they not?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in respect to the Treasury Department there are a multitude of collectors and deputy collectors and other agents outside of Washington, and so in the Internal-Revenue Those have not entered into this count. So the count is as fair on one side as on the other.

Now, take the Interior Department. The aggregate number of employees in that Department here in Washington, and I do not include the agents they have in the field, is 3,835. The total number of employees in the Patent Office here is 605. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that my statement is based upon figures that I got from the Department a year ago as the result of a direct correspondence with the Department.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the number in the Patent Office?

Mr. NELSON. Six hundred and five here in Washington.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the number has somewhat enlarged, and that there are now between 600 and 700 employees.

Mr. NELSON. The number may have been enlarged. These figures were given a year ago.

Now, as to the Census Office, it is impossible to give the figures. I understand that that Bureau had somewhere in the neighborhood of 2,700 employees, exclusive of the enumerators. They had at the maximum something like 2,700 employees and a little over here in Washington. That force has been reduced. A month ago, I think, it was reduced to 1,700 or 1,800, and it is still being reduced. I apprehend at this time that there are perhaps not more than half of the original force in that Bureau, and it is likely that within the next year it will be largely reduced, perhaps reduced to 400 or 500 employees

The Bureau of Foreign Commerce, which is the only Bureau transferred from the Department of State, has 10 employees. Then we have three departments, or bureaus, or divisions that are outside of any executive department. They exist by themselves independently. One is the Department of Labor, with a force of 78 employees. Another is the United States Fish Commission with 28 condenses and in the United States Fish Commission with 28 condenses and in the United States Fish Commission. mission, with 38 employees, and in that I do not include any of those who are out at the different fish stations of the country.

I have also made a brief estimate of the additional force that I imagine would be necessary for this new department to start with, and the salaries, in addition to the force it gets by a transfer of these and the salaries, in addition to the force it gets by a transfer of these bureaus and divisions of the public service. First, secretary, with a salary of $8,000; assistant secretary, $4,000; chief of the bureau of manufactures, $3,000. Those are the three principal offices for which salary is provided in the bill.

Then in the secretary's office I have estimated, after conferring with those who ought to know, that it would require in the first instance 1 chief clerk, 1 disbursing clerk, 1 clerk of class 4, 2 clerks of class 3, 2 clerks of class 2, and 6 of class 1. The aggregate salary of these would be $18,800.

In the bureau of manufactures, which is a new bureau entirely, I estimate that the force in the first instance required would be a chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000; 1 clerk of class 4, $1,800; 2 clerks of class 3, $3,200; 4 clerks of class 2, $5,600; and 6 clerks of class

1, $7,200; making a total of $19,800.

The aggregate increase of salaries by this bill, as I figure it, would be $53,600. This would equip the department, in the first instance, with a working force, in addition to the force gathered by a transfer from the different bureaus and divisions of the public service.

I submit the figures in detail and in tabulated form to be inserted in the RECORD.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Total department of commerce after transfers.....

Mr. NELSON. Now, Mr. President, some question has been raised about the Census Office. I desire to say, in reference to the Census Office, that, as Senators know, that office deals exclusively with agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and vital statistics of all kinds. By looking at the different departments we find that this matter of statistics is a good deal duplicated. They have a statistical bureau in the State Department known as the Bureau of Foreign Commerce. They have in the known as the Bureau of Foreign Commerce. They have in the Treasury Department the great Bureau of Statistics. Then, in addition to that, we have the Census Bureau. Now, these different bureaus duplicate the work.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there not also a statistical division in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. NELSON. I was coming to that. That is an independent department. They have a statistical division there.

It appeared to the committee, and it so appears to me, and I think it will appear to any Senator who gives the subject reflection, that this duplication of statistical work is unnecessary and leads to needless expense. Hence we feel that it would be a good plan to attach the Census Bureau, the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, and the Bureau of Foreign Commerce in the State Department to the department of commerce.

Now, we do not undertake to do it at this time, but I think in time, after we get a secretary at the head of that department, and after he has considered and carefully digested the work of these three different divisions, he will be able to formulate a plan and present a programme to Congress by which all the statistical work can be done under one head and under one division, so that when we come to look up a matter of statistics we shall not have to go for some part of it to the bureau of foreign commerce, for another part to the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, for another to the Census Office, and for another to the Agricultural Department.

The matter of census statistics pertains, if it pertains anywhere at all, to our commercial and industrial development, and I think if Senators will reflect a moment they will all agree with me that this statistical work ought to belong to and be a part of the department of commerce.

Now, coming to the Department of Labor, that, we find, stands isolated and by itself. The purpose of that Department is to look after our laboring interests. That Department gathers and compiles a lot of statistics. It is the duty of that Department peculiarly to look after the interests of our laboring men. But our laboring men are vitally interested in our commercial and our industrial development, in our shipping industries, and in our fishery industries, and they are also vitally interested in the question of immigration, the Bureau of Immigration being attached by this bill to the department of commerce.

It is to far greater advantage to the labor interests of this country that their work can articulate and be in harmony with all these other interests and bear directly upon the welfare of the these other interests and bear directly upon the welfare of the laboring men. The laboring men of this country are vitally interested in the immigration question. They are vitally interested in the shipping question and in a merchant marine. They are vitally interested in our manufacturing industries. They are vitally interested in our fishing industries. They are vitally interested in our commercial development. By gathering all these bureaus and departments into one whole, under one head, the department can work to better nurroses and more efficiently for department can work to better purpose and more efficiently for department can work to better purpose and more emclently for the labor interests, the manufacturing interests, and the commer-cial interests of this country.

I think if Senators will reflect they will see that it is for the interest of the laboring men to belong to a department where they can have something to say on the question of immigration; something to say in reference to the fishing industries; something to say in reference to our manufacturing industries; something to say in reference to our manufacturing industries and our manufacturing development, and the things which per-and our manufacturing development, and the things which pertain to our great commerce, foreign and inland.

Instead of this being one of the largest departments, as was intimated the other day, I find, on figuring up the employees in the various departments and divisions of the public service, we would be taking 286 employees from the Treasury Department and, assuming that the Patent Office is taken, 605 from the Interior Department; from the State Department, the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, we would take 10; from the Department of Labor we would take 78; from the Fish Commission, 38, and, counting what I have estimated would be necessary in the first instance for the department of commerce as an additional force of 30 members, it would make the total operating force of this new department 1,047. The number would be 1,047, as compared with 4,595 who would still be left in the Treasury Department, 3,835 in the Interior Department and in the State Department, 3,835 in the Interior Department, and in the State Department 85.

the Interior Department, and in the State Department 85. I may state that in giving these figures I have not included the Census Bureau, for the reason that the force of that Bureau, under the present circumstances is a fluctuating force.

Now, in reference to the Patent Office, the committee were of the opinion that inasmuch as the great work of the Patent Office pertains largely to industrial inventions, inventions relating to commerce, manufacturing, shipping, and all that, it is more germane and has a closer connection and bearing upon the department of commerce than upon the Interior Department. ment of commerce than upon the Interior Department.

Now, what is the Interior Department, and what has that Department left? The Interior Department was established in 1849. I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that when that Department was established in 1849 it was established by transferring other bureaus and divisions from the other departments. The Patent Office business up to 1849 had belonged to the State Department, and it was transferred to the new Department of the Interior. The course work covering on whole the United the Interior. The census work, carried on under the United States marshals, but under the charge of the State Department, was transferred to the Interior Department.

The Patent Office had up to that time been under the State Department, and it was transferred. The Indian Office was transferred from the War Department. The Land Office was transferred from the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department up to that time had charge of the sale of our public The Pension Office was transferred from the War Department. There was a time in our history when the War Department and the Navy Department jointly exercised authority over naval and military pensions. It was afterwards vested in the War Department, and the War Department, until the Depart-ment of the Interior was established, in 1849, continued to have charge of the Pension Bureau.

If you look at the history of the departments you will thus see that the Interior Department, established in 1849, was established simply by a transfer from the other overloaded departments of simply by a transfer from the other overloaded departments of the Government, bureaus, and divisions, and the part so trans-ferred constituted the main and principal work of that Depart-ment. The congestion which had then occurred in the other de-partments leading to the establishment of the then new Depart-ment of the Interior exists now to a greater extent, especially in the Treasury Department. It seems that of later years almost everything new under the sun in reference to light-houses, the Marine-Hospital Service, and a lot of matters pertaining to com-merce and payingstion and immigration have been thrown into merce and navigation and immigration have been thrown into the Treasury Department, when as a matter of fact they did not pertain to the main and principal functions of that Department.

Mr. President, I feel that perhaps I have taken up the time of the Senate too long on this matter. I think there is a strong pub-lic sentiment throughout the country in favor of the establishment of this new department. I think we need this new department in order to put ourselves on a parity with the other great commercial and industrial nations of the world. We need this department in order to place our industrial development and our commercial development under governmental control, so that the various industries of this country, the commercial and manufacturing industries, and shipping industries, and our merchant marine, can have that governmental guidance and governmental assistance which are now so well performed by the Agricultural Department for the agricultural interests of the country Department for the agricultural interests of the country. I wish to say, further, in this connection about the bill, that personally I claim no credit for it. The bill was originally prepared by the worthy Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who so ably presides over the deliberations of this body. He prepared the bill and, I think, reported it favorably in the Fifty-fifth Congress. The present bill is simply a slight elaboration and amendment of that bill. The idea came from the Senator from Maine originally, and the committee have now simply presented his bill to the Senate with some amendments and changes.

originally, and the committee have how simply presented his bill to the Senate with some amendments and changes.

The public demand for this legislation has not only been so great as to call the attention of Senators to it, but it also called the attention of our new President to it. Senators will remember that in his annual message to Congress he highly recommended the establishment of this new department.

mended the establishment of this new department.

I have aimed to take up as little time of this body as possible. I wish to say in conclusion that I sincerely trust everyone who is in favor of this department of commerce will allow us to get to a vote on the bill to-day. Other matters of great importance are coming up; the Philippine tariff, the Cuban tariff, and other questions that will lead to great debate, and I shall be very glad if the Senate will allow a vote to be taken on this bill to-day.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he as considered the question, and whether he would be willing to agree to an amendment to eliminate the Patent Office.

be willing to agree to an amendment to eliminate the Patent Office from the bureaus which it is proposed to transfer to the new department.

Mr. NELSON. Speaking for myself-I am not authorized to speak for the committee—but personally I should have no objection. I think this department of commerce could do good work and exist well without the Patent Office. But I prefer, in the absence of instructions from the committee, to have the question submitted to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to this bill because I suggest that it be amended by striking out the transfer of the Patent Office to this new department. I am certainly in favor of the bill. I think a department of commerce is needed and has been needed for many years. I think it can be made of immense value to the

for many years. I think it can be made of immense value to the country and the industries of the country; its commerce by land and by sea; its manufacturing and other industries, which not only build up the country, but upon which the country depends for its prosperity.

I make these remarks in order that there may be no misapprehension on account of what I shall say about the Patent Office. I do not know that it is necessary that I should elaborate upon that subject. The Patent Office is nominally connected with the Interior Department. It is to a certain extent an independent bureau or department. The Commissioner of Patents reports by law to Congress.

The chief connection at the present time between the Patent Office and the Interior Department is that the Secretary of the Interior fice and the Interior Department is that the Secretary of the Intence and the interior Department is that the Secretary of the Interior has a supervisory power over the administrative action of the Commissioner of Patents. I think that by statute all appeals from the Commissioner of Patents upon the issuance of patents, the issuance of trade-marks, in interference cases, and in all matters relating to the issue of patents, have been taken away from the Secretary of the Interior and jurisdiction has been vested in courts in the District of Columbia.

But the inventors of the country who do their business through the Inventors of the country who do their business through the Patent Office have become accustomed to it where it is, and in connection with the Interior Department, There is quite a body of legislation which determines and specifies the connection which exists between the Patent Office and the Interior Depart-ment. It does not overburden the Interior Department, and I think is more properly connected with that Department than it would be with the pay department.

would be with the new department,

The new department is specially and particularly to devote its attention to the commerce of the United States and to the articles which form the commerce of the United States. The connection between the granting of patents and the commerce of the United States is at least very remote. The Patent Office issues patents for inventions. They are in the nature of contracts between the Government and an inventor by which there becomes vested in him the right to use his invention for a limited time. Invention and letters patent have no immediate relation to commerce. It is only when some article for which a patent has been granted is manufactured and then transported from the place of manufacture to the place of use that it comes at all within the jurisdiction of

Therefore, the relations between the Patent Office and the In-Therefore, the relations between the Patent Office and the Interior Department having been long established, being well understood, it being no burden upon the Interior Department, and relating, if at all, only in the most remote degree to commerce, I hope the committee will agree to an amendment striking that clause out of this bill. If hereafter it should be thought wise to transfer it, that could be done, but perhaps I may express the opinion that it would be more for the interest of the new department ways for its practical executions and development at the second of the second o ment, more for its practical organization and development, not to ment, more for its practical organization and development, not to have too much work thrust upon it at the outset.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, after conferring with several of the members of the Committee on Commerce, such members as are here on the floor, I think I shall make no opposition to striking out of the bill the provision for the transfer of the Patent Office.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it be in order, then, I would move that the words "the Patent Office," be stricken out from line 16 on page 3. I do not know that it is referred to anywhere else in the bill.

Mr. NELSON. No; nowhere else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. In line 16 of the new print on page 3 it is proposed to strike out the words "the Patent Office."

Mr. VEST. What are the words?

Mr. VEST. What are the words?

The SECRETARY. "The Patent Office."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. It is agreed to. Are there further amendments?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I wish to attract the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge to the language of the proviso on the seventh page, beginning at line 11:

And provided further, That all officers, clerks, and employees now employed in any of the bureaus, offices, departments, or branches of the public service in this act transferred to the department of commerce are each and all hereby transferred to said department at their present grades and salaries, except where otherwise provided in this act, and they shall continue in office and employment as if appointed under this act until otherwise provided by law. vided by law

Does not the Senator accomplish all that ought to be accomplished and eliminate a possible question by striking out all after the word "act," striking out the words "and they shall continue the word act, strking out the words and they shall continue in office and employment as if appointed under this act until otherwise provided by law?"

Mr. NELSON. I can see no objection to striking out those words. I do not think it would militate against the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. No; your purpose is to secure a transfer? Mr. NELSON. I want a transfer made of these employees just

Mr. NELSON. I want a transfer made of these employees just as they are.

Mr. SPOONER. Without any provision of law which might be construed to continue them at their salaries and grade?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. That was not my purpose at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I am satisfied it was not.

Mr. HALE. It would be better to let the clause go out.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I will let it go out.

Mr. SPOONER. In line 17, after the word "act," I move to strike out the words "and they shall continue in office and employment as if appointed under this act until otherwise provided by law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. There is an amendment pending offered by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the pending amendment offered by the committee.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, line 11, page 3 of the new print, after the word "Statistics," the Committee on Commerce report to strike out the words "and the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey."

Survey."
Mr. NELSON. Let that amendment be passed over for the present. There is another amendment, an amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], that is pending, to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.
The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following, as a new section:

Sec.—A person, to be designated by the Secretary of State, shall be appointed to formulate for the instruction of consular officers the requests of the secretary of commerce, and to prepare from the dispatches of consular officers, for transmission to the secretary of commerce, such information as pertains to the work of the department of commerce, and such person shall have the rank and salary of a chief of bureau, and be furnished with such clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. NELSON. I want to explain to the Senator from Wisconsin, as he was not here at the time the amendment was offered

Mr. SPOONER. I understand it and I do not like it. not say that I am satisfied with the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge]. I do not object to the creation of a new bureau in the State Department for the purpose, under the direction of the Secretary of State, of carrying out the provisions of this act so far as they relate to the proposed department of commerces, but I think it is a commerced by the state of the proposed department of commerce; but I think it is a very peculiar proposition that a subordinate in the State Department should be required by law to formulate instructions to consular officers based upon requests of the secretary of commerce upon the State Department for statistical information furnished by consuls.

It seems to me that the secretary of commerce, when he has occasion to communicate with the State Department, should communicate with the Secretary of State. I think there should be some elasticity in this bill in that respect, which would be want-some elasticity in this bill in that respect, which would be wanting in it if this amendment were adopted.

The bill is well drawn, in the first place, without the amendment, in my opinion. It might be improved, probably, by adopting so much of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as provides for an additional bureau. To that I have no objection whatever. But primarily a consul is a commercial agent; he is not a diplomatic functionary, although it is true that sometimes he does perform sub modo diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic functions. This bill, however, provides for reports by consuls to the secretary of the department of commerce only as to statistical information gathered having relation to our only as to statistical information gathered having relation to our foreign commerce. It says:

And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the secretary of commerce, to gather and compile, from time to time, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, industries, and markets of the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited—

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Where is the Senator reading from?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from page 5.
Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment. It proceeds-and to send reports quarterly, or oftener if required, of the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, to the secretary of the department of

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator he is reading from an earlier print of the bill. The bill was originally in that form. Mr. SPOONER. How is it now?

Mr. NELSON. The bill was originally in a form that required all consular officers to make reports relating to commercial matters directly to the department of commerce. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], after conferring with the State Department, came to the conclusion that oftentimes in consular reports diplomatic matters, or matters of a quasi diplomatic character, were mixed with commercial matters, and, therefore, in order not to get the two confounded, those commercial reports from consuls should first be sent to the State Department and edited by that Department before being sent to the department of commerce. That is the object, and this amendment was drawn in harmony with that view.

As the bill has been amended, the paragraph from which the Senator has been reading reads as follows:

And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals

Mr. SPOONER. Where does the Senator read from? Mr. NELSON. From page 5 of the new print of the bill, com-Mr. NELSON. mencing in line 10.

And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State—

The words "under the direction of the Secretary of State" have been put in. Then the clause goes onto gather and compile, from time to time, upon the request of the secretary of commerce, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, industries, and markets of the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited, and to send, under the direction of the Secretary of State. tary of Statereports quarterly, or oftener if required, of the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, to the secretary of the department of commerce.

The amendment now pending is supplemental to those changes. It is to provide somebody in the State Department to revise the commercial reports that come in from our consular officers and eliminate all matters of a diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic character, so as to send only commercial matter to the department of commerce

Mr. SPOONER. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to the amendment. I was not aware of it. It has put the language in a form which makes it altogether acceptable to me, and as the Senate has already adopted the amendment which I had marked as proper to be made in the old draft of the bill, so far as that is concerned I have nothing further to say. I think, however, that the amendment proposing an additional section may be improved upon by making it a little more elastic. It reads.

A person, to be designated by the Secretary of State, shall be appointed to formulate for the instruction of consular officers—

That makes it by law the duty of this particular officer to formulate these instructions-

the requests of the secretary of commerce, and to prepare from the dispatches of consular officers, for transmission to the secretary of commerce, such information as pertains to the work of the department of commerce; and such person shall have the rank and salary of a chief of bureau and be furnished with such clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of

Mr. NELSON. I simply suggest to the Senator that it would meet the objection by inserting there that the work shall be done "under the direction of the Secretary of State." Putting in those words will cover any objection the Senator might have on that point—that he shall do it "under the direction of the Secretary of State."

State."

Mr. SPOONER. I think it would be better to amend the amendment so as to provide that for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 5 the Secretary of State is authorized to appoint some suitable officer, who shall have the rank and salary of a chief of bureau, and be furnished with such clerical assistance as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of State. In other words, whoever is appointed there is to work under the direction and care of the Secretary of State, and his peculiar functions ought not to be prescribed by statute. The Secretary of State might have occasion to call upon some other bureau of the functions ought not to be prescribed by statute. The Secretary of State might have occasion to call upon some other bureau of the Department, or some other officer, and he ought to be left free-handed. I am perfectly willing that an additional person shall be appointed, or a bureau created, but I do not like the language of the amendment prescribing by law the particular duty of this person. I suppose the Secretary of State could change the heads of the various base of the could be redistribution of the functions. of the various bureaus or make a redistribution of the functions of the various bureaus or make a redistribution of the functions of the different bureaus, and he ought, as far as possible in that respect, to be left free, just as any Secretary should be, I think. I will draft an amendment, if the Senator is not wedded to this proposition, which will accomplish the same thing.

Mr. NELSON. No; I am not wedded to any particlar language. In view of the fact that the Senator from Maine [Mr. Hale] is disposed to insist upon his amendment to transfer the Coast and Geodetic Survey to the Navy Department, but is content to leave it under the Treasury Department, if no Senator from the Committee on Commerce is opposed to it, I shall be disposed to acquiesce in striking the Coast and Geodetic Survey out of this

Mr. HALE. Let that be done; and if there is any controversy

Mr. HALE. Let that be done; and if there is any controversy hereafter about it, it can come up by itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson]?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out the provision in relation to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out the provision in relation to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. NELSON. To leave the Coast and Geodetic Survey where it is, in the Treasury Department. We do not do anything with it.

Mr. BACON. Let the proposed amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, section 4, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "and the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the word "and" be inserted after the word "Immigration."

Mr. NELSON. I will move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. On page 3, section 4, line 10, after the words "Bureau of Immigration," it is proposed to insert the word "and." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I will move an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge]. In line 2, after the word "formulate," I move to insert the words "under his direction;" so as to read:

A person, to be designated by the Secretary of State, shall be appointed to

A person, to be designated by the Secretary of State, shall be appointed to formulate, under his direction, for the instruction of consular officers, etc.

Mr. NELSON. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.
Mr. SPOONER. "To formulate" is very different from "to formulate, under his direction.'

Mr. NELSON. That amendment makes the language in harmony with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. PETTUS. As to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], he took great pains to prepare it, and as the bill is going over, I suggest that this amendment also go over with it.

Mr. NELSON. I have been hoping to get a vote on the bill

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] and I are in entire accord; and if he had not offered the amendment I should have done so. I have no idea that the Senator from Massachusetts, if here, would object to the proposed change. It is in line with what he and I had in view.

Mr. NELSON. There is no objection to it.

Mr. PETTUS. Is it proposed to vote on the bill now?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTUS. Is it proposed to vote on the bill now?
Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BACON. Oh, no.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] will be stated.
The Secretary. It is proposed to amend the amendment of Mr. Lodge in line 2, after the word "formulate," by inserting the words "under his direction."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Minnesota will not ask the Senate to vote upon this bill to-day. It is certainly a very important and far-reaching measure, one which the Senate would doubtless like to see in print and be given an opportunity to examine critically before passing upon it. It is a bill which creates a most important department of the Government, and I trust it may be found consistent with the wishes of the Senator that it may be put in print as it has been amended and go over until some future time.

Mr. NELSON. I appeal to the Senator from Georgia to allow us to take the vote on the bill to-day. I want to say to the Senator—I know he is disposed to do what is fair—that there have been no material amendments made to the bill to-day. I can explain them all in the bill as printed. One amendment has been dropped out about the Patent Office. That was agreed to the other day. We have dropped out the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and there has been a change in phrasecology, suggested by the Senator from has been a change in phraseology, suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner], to avoid any possibility of any of the employees in the Bureau being transferred or continuing them in office outside of their present status. Then there has been a slight amendment made to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which relates simply to consular reports. The Senator from Georgia will be doing me a great favor if he will Senator from Georgia will be doing me a great lavol it allow the vote on the bill to be taken to-day. I appeal to him for this reason: I should have no objection to its going over, but the Greater is familiar with the proceedings in the Senate. The Phil-Senator is familiar with the proceedings in the Senate. The Philippine tariff bill will be called up to-morrow; it will lead to a great deal of discussion. And there are other important matters coming up which will also lead to a great deal of debate. So if this bill is now to go over its passage may be very much delayed.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I will state to my colleague, with the permission of the Senator from Minnesota, that I think this bill has been most maturely considered by the Commerce Com-mittee and by the subcommittee, and the amendments which have been adopted have been practically unanimously agreed to. I believe that my colleague, on a few minutes' investigation, will agree that the vote shall be taken on the bill to-day. I do not believe that anything can be lost by it. There has been practically no opposition to this bill in the Commerce Committee. In fact, I believe that the members of the Commerce Committee, with one or two exceptions, who were not present, voted for the passage of the bill. For my part, I have considered it maturely. I am in favor of the passage of the measure, and certainly it has commended itself to my favorable consideration. It provides for reports as to foreign markets and other matters, which, doubtless, will be of great benefit to the people of the United States. So I hope the Senator from Minnesota will be permitted to get a vote on the bill to-day, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts

[Mr. Lodge], as amended on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Spooner].

The amendment as amended was agreed to.
Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson], and my no less distinguished colleague [Mr. Clay], it seems to me urge, without any very great reason for it, the immediate consideration of this bill with reference to its passage. The Senator from Minnesota appeals to me as a personal favor. Why, Mr. President, this is not a personal matter; this is not a matter which relates to the Senator personally in any way, nor to his section or State, and therefore there is no ground way, nor to his section or state, and therefore there is no ground upon which a personal appeal can be made. Nor, Mr. President, is there any suggestion of a reason which makes it imperative that this bill should be disposed of to-day. If there is practically no opposition to the bill, there is certainly no reason why there should be an apprehension of undue delay hereafter.

I think in a matter of this kind it is due to the Senate that such a bill, before it is put on its passage, should be in print, so that we may all see it and read it. I expect to vote for the bill, but at the same time I want to have an opportunity to examine it as it now stands. Some of these amendments have been made verbally. A number of amendments were made on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] the other day, not one of which was reduced to writing, but made verbally from his eat. They ought to be in print.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill has been reprinted.

Mr. BACON. That may be true; but the bill as it now stands

Will the Senator allow me a word?

has not been printed.

Mr. NELSON. Will the
Mr. BACON. Certainly.
Mr. NELSON. The amer The amendments of the Senator from Massachusetts, except the one amendment acted upon to-day, are in-corporated in the bill as it was reprinted. I want to say further to the Senator that the bill has been under consideration on three different days, and the amendments which to-day have been made to the bill are simple amendments. I think the Senator can see the force of them at a glance. I hope he will agree that Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not oppose a vote at this time for the purpose of antagonizing the bill. I repeat, I expect to vote for it, but at the same time I desire to have the opportunity to see the bill as it will be when put upon its passage.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator agree that we may take a vote on the bill to-morrow at 2 o'clock?

Mr. BACON. I am perfectly willing that the Senate should agree to that. I do not know whether my special agreement would be of any advantage, but, if the Senator so desires, I have no objection to the Senator having an agreement of the Senate to that effect, if he can get it.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what was done in relation to the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. NELSON. That was dropped out of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. That was dropped out of the old.

Mr. VEST. And left in the Treasury Department?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; left in the Treasury Department.

Mr. VEST. What was done with reference to the Patent Office?

Mr. NELSON. That was dropped out, and the Patent Office is to be kept where it is, in the Interior Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. What about the Census Office?

to be kept where it is, in the Interior Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. What about the Census Office?

Mr. NELSON. That is left in the bill.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the other day—I could not hear distinctly on account of the talk that was going on all around me here—but in a colloquy which took place between the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. Hale] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] I understand there was some sort of an agreement that the Coast and Geodetic Survey should be transferred to the Navy Department. It seems now, however, as I am informed by the senior Senator from Maine, there was some sort of an agreement or understanding that it should be only left in the Treasury Department, where it is now.

Department, where it is now.

I want to state this—and I have a right under the rules to state it—in the Committee on Commerce, from which the bill came, I voted for the bill with some reluctance, because, as a general proposition, I am opposed to multiplying offices. I reluctantly agreed to vote for it, because I remember a remark made at one time by Ren Berdin, of Kontucky in we heaved in receased to time by Ben Hardin, of Kentucky, in my boyhood in regard to offices, which I have never forgotten. He said, "If you want to have more martins, put up more martin boxes." The proposition he was discussing was in regard to making the judiciary in Kentucky elective in the constitution of 1849. When you create more offices you will always, as a matter of course, find people to

There are occasions in which it is absolutely necessary to furnish instrumentalities for the business of the Government. We have arrived at a stage where it is absolutely necessary, in my opinion, to increase the Departments. Let me say as a corollary to that proposition, it is necessary to build new edifices for the accommodation of the Departments. We pay now annually over $180,000 rent in this city for houses and rooms which are occupied by the Departments. When we are selling our bonds at 2 per cent interest, we pay these enormous rents directly in the teeth of all correct business principles.

I think there ought to be two more departments of the Government. We ought to have a department of commerce. In my judgment it is absolutely necessary. But when it comes to the question as to where the Coast and Geodetic Survey ought to be, I am unequivocally opposed to recognizing that it is now in the proper Department. The Treasury Department in its special functions has no more to do with the Coast and Geodetic Survey than a steamer on the ocean has to do with the planting of a field of corn.

This Bureau ought to be taken out of the Treasury Department. This Bureau ought to be taken out of the Freasury Department. The Treasury Department now, as every Senator knows, is overloaded to the verge of absurdity. The Interior Department, although we took one great bureau from it—that of Agriculture—is now four departments in one, and the want of accommodation in the way of room for these departments has become so apparent that no Senator here will rise and say that the accommodation in the way of the control tions of the officers of the Government in those departments are decent or comfortable.

If any Senator will point out to me how the Coast and Geodetic Survey is in any way cognate or appropriate in the Treasury Department, I shall be very much obliged to him. I understand the proposition now is to put it in the Navy Department. It seems to me the Navy Department is large enough now. We hear continued complaints that the building in which it is located is insufficient for the accompanion of the source. is insufficient for the accommodation of the service. should this Bureau, not connected with the Navy, not necessary to the functions of the Navy, be taken from the Department of the Treasury and put in that of the Navy? I do protest against the putting of the Coast and Geodetic Survey with the financial department of the Government or putting it with that of the Navy.

Mr. BACON. I have not participated in the debate, although I have given attention to what has been said by the Senator in charge of the bill and by those more directly connected with it as members of the committee. I should like to know upon what theory the Census Bureau is to be put into the Department of Commerce. If it relates to it in any manner I confess my inability to see where that relationship is found, and I should like for the distinguished Senator from Minnesota to tell us upon what theory it has been deemed proper that a department of commerce should have charge of a census bureau.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from Georgia was not in the Chamber or he would not have asked this question, for I covon looking over the statistical work of our different departments we find it scattered. There is in the Department of State a statiscal department, called the department of foreign commerce, which compiles statistics from our consular reports. there is in the Treasury Department a statistical bureau, and the Senator from Georgia is familiar with that.

The Census Office is wholly a statistical office, gathering and compiling vital statistics and statistics as to our commerce, our manufactures, our shipping, and everything that pertains to the industrial development of this country. It occurred to the committee, as it has to me. that there is a great deal of duplication in the statistical work, and that it would be better to get the statistical work all grouped in one department, to wit, the department of commerce, which relates to commerce and to our industrial development, manufacturing, shipping, and fishing interests. By getting the statistical bureaus together by and by some secretary of the department of commerce, after having observed the workings of the different bureaus, will be able to prepare and formulate a plan or programme for a future Congress by which the statistical work can be done under one head and as one work, so that when we come to look up statistical matters we can find them in one publication.

In the Department of Labor, which is to be transferred to this new department, there is a good deal of statistical work, and we have in the Agricultural Department a statistical division. Now, if we group all the statistical work together under one executive head, whether in the State Department, the Treasury Department, the Department of Labor, or the Census Office, we can by and by so adjust matters relating to statistics as to have our statistics taken as an entirety and to have our statistical work furnished us in one compilation. Then, when we come to look up foreign commerce we shall not have to look to the State Department for the publication. When we come to look up other statistical matters we shall not have to look to the Treasury Department. When we come to look up the statistical matters we shall not have to look to the Treasury Department. partment. When we come to look up the matter of vital statistics and labor statistics and other commercial and industrial statistics we shall not have to look to the Census and Labor bureaus. I think if my friend from Georgia were at the head of the new department—and I should be glad to see a man of such ability at its head—one of the first things he would consider would be the work of these different statistical divisions, and he would endeavor to see if it were not possible to formulate some plan or programme by which they could work in harmony and in entirety, so as to give to Congress the results in one compilation and one publica-tion instead of in a variety of publications.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to ask the distinguished Senator whether the programme which he has outlined is one in anticipation in its completeness, or whether this bill endeavors to complete it? In other words, does this bill provide for the transfer to this particular department of these various statistical divisions of the departments of the Government, or will the State Department still have its statistical bureau and the Treasury Department still have its?

Mr. NELSON. No; they are transferred. The Bureau of For-eign Commerce in the State Department, the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, and the Census Office are transferred to this new department, but we could not at this stage formulate any plan for united and harmonious work. That can only be done, or the programme for it outlined, when the three statistical That can only be bureaus or divisions are grouped together under one head and in one department, where their workings and their work can be considered and plans outlined for harmonious and united work.

I have no plan in view, and at this stage it seemed to me that all we could do was to transfer these bureaus at this time and group them under one executive head, and then let the future decide whether we could not get the statistical work into one harmonious whole, to the advantage of the Government in the matter of expense and the advantage of the Government and ourselves in the matter of securing information.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say, in justice to myself, that the Senator has made a very clear statement and has suggested to me reason which had not occurred to me before. highly proper that the statistical bureaus should, to some extent or to a very great extent, be put under one general control. Whether that control ought to be under the department of commerce or under some other department, the Department of the Interior, for instance, I do not think makes any material differ-ence, except so far as practicable to equalize the labors of the ence, except so far as practicable to equalize the labors of the different great departments of the Government.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, in appealing a while ago to my colleague to permit a vote on this bill to-day, I thought he was in thorough sympathy with the bill and that he had considered it maturely. Idid not know that he wanted more time to look into it.

Now, I agree with what the Senator from Missouri has said. I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce which made a favorable report on the bill. If Senators will examine the Congressional Record, they will find that when the Department of Agriculture was established members of the Senate stated on the floor that it would be an unnecessary expense, but I doubt if there could be obtained a single vote in this body to-day to repeal the law creating that Department. This body to-day to repeal the law creating that Department. This country is growing all the time, and, as the Senator from Missouri has said, we need a department of commerce.

We looked into this matter most carefully. We found that the Treasury Department was overcrowded, and we took from that Department and brought into this new department such bureaus as ought, in our judgment, to be transferred. We likewise went to the Interior Department, Mr. President, and if Senators will take the fifth section of this bill and read it, which is the real gist of the whole bill providing for the establishment of a department of commerce, I can not possibly see how any Senator can oppose it. I ask unanimous consent that the fifth section be printed in the Record as a part of my remarks.

The section is as follows:

The section is as follows:

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of commerce a bureau to be called the bureau of manufactures, and a chief of said bureau, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau one chief clerk and such other clerical assistants as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. It shall be the province and duty of said bureau, under the direction of the secretary to foster, promote, and develop the various manufacturing industries of the United States, and markets for the same at home and abroad, domestic and foreign, by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such industries and such markets, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the secretary or provided by law. And all consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile, from time to time, upon the request of the secretary of commerce, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, useful and material of the send, under the direction of the Secretary of State, reports quarterly, or oftener if required, of the information and statistics thus gathered and compiled, to the secretary of the department of commerce.

I should not have appealed to my colleague to preprit a vote on

I should not have appealed to my colleague to permit a vote on this measure to-day but that I thought he had maturely consid-ered it. It has been before the Senate for several days; but, of course, if the Senator has not had time to examine the bill carefully, I would not appeal to him to allow a vote to-day. My reason for doing so was simply that I thought he thoroughly understood it

Mr. BACON. I just simply admit that I do not thoroughly understand it, and I want to understand it before I vote on it. I am not the only Senator who occupies that position. I am in accord with the proposition that we should have an additional department. I expect to vote for this bill, but I desire to read it; and if I have the right so to do, I shall ask that a vote be not taken to-day. I am perfectly willing that a vote shall be taken to-morrow. Of course I have no right to make an agreement of that kind; but if the Senate sees proper to make it, I shall have no objection.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill what is the exact meaning of the words on page 3, line 19, "The Department of Labor." What is the intention of those

Mr. NELSON. It is called a Department, but it is not an Executive Department. Let me call the Senator's attention to the Agricultural Department. It was called a Department for years, Agricultural Department. It was called a Department for years, but it had only a Commissioner at its head. It was not until 1889 that it was made an Executive Department. Now, this is called the Department of Labor, but it is not an Executive Department. It is really an independent department, not belonging to any department, standing by itself.

Mr. PETTUS. It is an independent Department, standing by itself, called a Department?

Mr. NELSON. It is not an Executive Department.

Mr. PETTUS. I understand, but the purpose of this bill, so far as those words are concerned, is to transfer all the duties of that Department to the new one?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; but leaving the work of the Depart-that Department to the new one?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; but leaving the work of the Department, as well as the force and everything else, undisturbed.

Mr. PETTUS. Had you not better have two words to mean different things? You have a department in a department. That does not sound very well.

Mr. NELSON. I know, but the misfortune is this, I will say to my friend, the Senator from Alabama: In the law it is to-day called a Department—the Department of Labor—but it is not an Executive Department, and the head of it is not a member of the Cabinet. It is technically really an independent bureau. Before Cabinet. It is technically really an independent bureau. Before the Commissioner of Agriculture became a Cabinet officer we had a Commissioner of Agriculture, and he presided over what we called in law the Department of Agriculture. It was called a Department long before we got a Secretary who was a member of the Cabinet. The law making it an Executive Department was enacted in 1889, if I remember it aright, when it was for the first time rade on Executive Department and the head of it. time made an Executive Department and the head of it a Secre-tary. Before that he was called the Commissioner of Agriculture tary. Before that he was called the Commissioner of Agricultural Department and the Department was called the Agricultural Department.

Mr. PETTUS. Then the purpose of this bill, so far as those words are concerned, is that the department of commerce shall absorb the Department of Labor?

Mr. NELSON. It shall absorb it in this way: It shall be like all these other divisions and bureaus of the public service-transferred to it under that executive head, but it does not contemplate the dismantling of the Department of Labor. It does not contemplate the dismantling of the Department of Labor. It does not contemplate changing the functions of it or at all disturbing the force. The bill simply places it in the department of commerce so that its work relating to the labor interests of the country (and a good deal of its work is of a statistical character) may articulate and work in harmony with the other bureaus and divisions of the new department.

Mr. PETTUS. I do not desire to discuss the bill; I merely wanted that information for the present, but I do desire that the wanted that information for the present, but I do desire that the bill shall go over.

Mr. NELSON. In view of the request made, I ask unanimous consent that we may take a vote on the question of the passage of the bill to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. FORAKER. At what hour?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two o'clock.

Mr. PETTUS. I may as well say that I can not agree to that. Mr. NELSON. Would any other hour to-morrow, or any other

Mr. PETTUS. I do not see the necessity of pressing the pending bill in this way. Although it is a measure much favored, still I think it ought to take the ordinary course. When gentlemen want to discuss and examine a measure, there should be no attempt to press it to a vote in a few days. I want this bill to go over. I do not know that I shall vote against the bill as a whole, because I am in hopes there will be some amendments added to it which will make it palatable to some of us who do not like it in its present shape

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PETTUS. There is an amendment pending which has not been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What amendment is that? Mr. PETTUS. It is an amendment to strike out certain words in line 11 on page 3. A motion to that effect was made at the last assion of the Senate, and it is so printed in the bill.

Mr. HALE. That has been voted on to-day.

Mr. NELSON. It has been acted on.

Mr. PETTUS. I have not heard it acted upon, and I have been here watching it all the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Every amendment which has been proposed up to this time has been acted upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, in line 15, page 3, after the word "Department," to strike out the words:

And that the Census Office and all that pertains to the same be, and the same hereby are, transferred from the Department of the Interior to the department of commerce, to remain henceforth under the jurisdiction of the latter.

I understand the Patent Office has already been stricken out. It leaves in the Census Office. I fail to see any reason on earth, above it, or beneath it, why the Census Office should be put under the department of commerce. It is an office which only once in every ten years takes the census of the living and of such things as may be prescribed by Congress, and it does it in obedience to the Constitution. Now, why should that be placed under the department of commerce, which has not a solitary thing to do with it? It primarily takes only the population and the necessary statistics in connection therewith, and it is not done annually; it is done only every ten years. It does not affect the project of the Senator from Minnesota to have all the statistical bureaus consolidated. The Census Office is not, in the strict sense of the word, a statistical bureau which gives information every year. It gives it only every ten years. Then it has to have a very large force, and as soon as the work is done the great bulk of that force is discharged.

Now, you put them together and consolidate a number of these offices, and the result will be that the first time the census is taken after the offices are consolidated the entire force of clerks put into it will be kept there, and it will add millions of dollars to the expenses of the Government. You can not avoid it. As it is now, every ten years the census is taken. The force is employed for two or three years, and then discharged. There is no further expense—that ends it. We have been limiting the operations of the Census Office. We limited it to three years. The present Director of the Census will complete the work within the time prescribed by Congress, and then the great body of clerks will be discharged, and there will be no necessity for this Bureau being under the department of commerce. You have already provided enough to keep the new secretary busy. You already have enough business before him to make the new department as great as any one of the other Departments, and why insist upon incorporating that which is not kindred in any of its labors or duties or the results of its labors. I hope the words put into it will be kept there, and it will add millions of dollars labors or duties or the results of its labors. I hope the words will be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockrell] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. In line 15, page 3, section 4, after the word "Department" it is proposed to strike out the words:

And that the Census Office, and all that pertains to the same, be, and the same hereby are, transferred from the Department of the Interior to the department of commerce, to remain henceforth under the jurisdiction of the latter.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be adopted. We have never heretofore made provision for the Census Office in any regular bill relating to a department. It is usual, and has been for many years, to prepare a separate bill each ten years in which it is provided how the census for the decennial period shall be taken. In those bills heretofore we have provided that the census shall be under the Secretary of the Interior. Now, when we come to deal with the census question, if it shall then appear that it is better to assign it to the new department, the department of commerce, there will be no objection. But it seems to me we have already provided very amply for this department without gathering into the bill creating it miscellaneous legislation which heretofore has been provided for only once in ten years. I suggest to my friend the bill creating it miscellaneous legislation which heretofore has been provided for only once in ten years. I suggest to my friend from Minnesota that he allow this to pass by and that it be provided for when we provide for taking the next census.

Mr. Mccumber. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether it is not a fact that five-sixths of the work that is to be accomplished by this new department is work which is now being accomplished by the Census Bureau; and as to the statistics that we are supposed to secure from this new department, could we not to-day get nine-tenths of those statistics from the Census Bureau? It seems to me that the Census Office, as a single department, to-day is more important really than the new office which is about to be created; and we are asked to make new office which is about to be created; and we are asked to make that merely a department under the general department of commerce That being the case, it seems to me we are taking one of the old established departments and practically destroying it, placing it under another department as a mere wing; the more important made the least important in this bill.

Not only that, but I understand there is a feeling which has been expressed by members of the Senate as well as by members of the House that the Census Bureau should be made permanent; and if it is made permanent we would be able to get from that department the statistics required, and it would be the proper department to go to. It would be the department which would have the gathering of statistics and facts concerning any matter from the very beginning, and would be the proper department to which to go to secure what information we desire. I myself can which to go to secure what information we desire. I myself can not see any good reason for swallowing up the Census Office practically in the new department of commerce.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, unless the debate is carried on so that we on this side can hear, we shall be under the necessity of asking that the matter go over until to-morrow, that we may read in the RECORD what Senators have said. I do not believe a Servicer on this side of the Chamber has heard a word of what was said by the Senator who has just taken his seat. That was probably due to the noise and confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to reargue this matter. I simply wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the Census Bureau is now under one of the Executive Departments. It is a part of the Interior Department. In transferring it to this department, it was not our purpose at all to have anything to do with the other question which has been suggested here, as to whether the work of the Census Bureau should be made permanent. The census, as the Senator from Missouri has well said, is taken only once in ten years. That is the fact in the field, but the compilation and publication go on. I dare say some of the work of publishing the volumes and indexing them and delivering them to Senators will continue for one or two years longer, ering them to Senators will continue for one or two years longer, although I am not familiar with that subject.

The question whether or not the bureau shall be permanent never entered into my consideration or into the consideration of any member of the Committee on Commerce, I think. We simply looked at the question in the light of the fact that the great work of the bureau is of a statistical character. It is not all a matter of population. When it comes to the matter of population and vital statistics, of course our plan is to take those statistics once in ten years, but when it comes to other statistics, relating to our manufacturing development, our shipping interests, our to our manufacturing development, our shipping interests, our navigation, our merchant marine, our commerce at home and abroad, those are statistical matters, which can be gathered from time to time. They are gathered, to a large extent, by the Bureau of Statistics from year to year.

Now, personally, for myself I am not tenacious at all about this or any other question before the Senate in reference to this bill. I am simply anxious to get a bill passed establishing a department of commerce, which shall have charge of our commercial ment of commerce, which shall have charge of our commercial and industrial interests. If Senators are of opinion that the work of the census is not more germane and pertinent to the department of commerce than to the Interior Department, I have nothing to say. I submit the question to the judgment of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr.

COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator who has this bill in charge to page 3, where it is provided that the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, now in the Department of State, shall be transferred to this new department. Then later, on page 4, there is this provision:

And the chief of said Bureau of Foreign Commerce shall be the assistant chief of the said Bureau of Statistics.

I want the Senator to tell me what is the object of providing that the head of one bureau shall be the assistant of another. It seems to me to be a remarkable provision, and one which it is not seems to me to be a remarkable provision, and one which it is howevery safe to allow to go in. But if the Senator can give me a good reason, I will not move to strike it out.

Mr. NELSON. The reason is this, if the Senator will allow me: There is in the Department of State a statistical bureau which was called the Bureau of Statistics. I think one or two years ago the name was changed and it was called the Bureau of Foreign Commerce. The work of that bureau is mainly of a statistical nature, and it is confined to our foreign commerce.

sists to a large extent in compiling statistics and information gathered through our consular representatives abroad.

Now, it was the plan of the bill to consolidate that statistical work with the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, and it occurred to the committee that in transferring that work to the Bureau of Statistics, it being at the head of one branch of the statistical work, it was well to make him the assistant chief. Now, this does not intend to change the salary, or the scope of it. It simply makes him the assistant chief with the same salary he is getting now. It does not change his salary or his work in any material particular. It leaves him to work under the direction of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, placing him as the next assistant, because of the fact that he brings to that Bureau all the work that appertains to our foreign commerce, and he is supposed to be more familiar with that particular branch of the work.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Bureau of Statistics, which is now in the Treasury Department, is to be transferred to this department and then, according to the Senator's statement, the Bureau of Statistics in the State Department is to be transferred also, and we are to have the two bureaus in this new department. The trouble now with statistics in the United States is that we have a Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department and practically a bureau of statistics in other divisions as well as in other departments. We have a Bureau of Statistics under the Director of the Mint, which is in the Treasury Department. We have a Bureau of Statistics in the Agricultural Department and one in the Interior Department. In other words, we have just as many bureaus of statistics as we have departments, and some more; and I will guarantee that when these bureaus pass upon the same identical question no two of them have, in ten years, been able to agree to the same thing. You can find statistics on the same subject coming from the same department that will not agree within sometimes a million or two of dollars or within as many tons, if it is a question of tons or bushels or whatever it may be.

There is not any statistical bureau in this Government in the strict and proper sense of the term. The Statistical Bureau in the Treasury Department have no right to revise the statistics of the Interior Department, nor even of the Treasury Department under another bureau. The Director of the Mint puts out statistics that do not very often agree with the statistics of the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury.

I have not been impressed, as some Senators have, with the crying necessity for another department, but I have not felt like making any objection to it. About the only consideration that has reconciled me to it was that there might be such a thing as one statistical bureau that might be a bureau worthy of that name.

Now, it appears that the Senator from Minnesota proposes to transfer one statistical bureau from the State Department and to leave it still an existing statistical bureau; and that he proposes to transfer one from the Treasury and leave it a statistical bureau.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The plan is not to leave them distinct bureaus. The Statistical Bureau from the State Department is to be consolidated with this other bureau.

Not by the terms of this bill. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. NELSON.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no. -It may be that that is what the Senator means, but that is not what is done. I will call the Senator's attention to it. I am not doing this in any hostility to the bill, but simply because we ought to make this measure as perfect as

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the language commencing in line 23, at the foot of page 3, following the semicolon?

That the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, now in the Department of State, be, and the same hereby is, transferred to the department of commerce and consolidated with and made a part of the Bureau of Statistics, hereinbefore transferred from the Department of the Treasury to the department of com-

Mr. TELLER. Well, it is still a bureau. Mr. NELSON. No; it is consolidated and made a part of it.

It is not to be a separate bureau any longer.

Mr. TELLER. If it is to be consolidated that bureau ought to be wiped out. The Senator still recognizes that there is to be a chief of the bureau that exists in the State Department, because that chief is to be the assistant of the bureau that is now in the Treasury Department. How there can be a head of that bureau and the head can be the assistant of the other bureau unless the two bureaus are still to exist I am unable to see. means that it is not to continue as a bureau the language of the bill should be changed.

Mr. NELSON. I call the Senator's attention to another part of the language that I did not read:

And the chief of said Bureau of Foreign Commerce shall be the assistant chief of the Bureau of Statistics; and it shall be the duty of said Bureau—

The consolidated bureau-

Mr. QUARLES. Where is that found? Mr. NELSON. I am reading on page 4 and it shall be the duty of said Bureau—

That means the consolidated Bureau-under the direction of the Secretary, in addition to the duties now prescribed by law, to gather, compile, classify and publish statistical information showing the condition of the foreign and domestic commerce, of the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, and of the transportation facilities of the United States.

It does not intend that there shall be two departments left. is the aim of the bill to consolidate and avoid the duplication of

Mr. TELLER. I imagine, then, from what the Senator says, that what he proposes is to legislate that chief, when he consolidated the bureaus, into the place of assistant, but that he does not do.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.
Mr. TELLER. That is what he wants to do. He has not done
it. There will still be two bureaus there. One comes from the Department of State and the other from the Treasury Depart-

Mr. COCKRELL. And there will be chiefs of each of them.
Mr. TELLER. There will be chiefs of each of them, but one will have a dual relation, because he will be the chief of one bureau and the assistant chief of the other. Now, if the Senator means that there shall not be two bureaus, he must change the language and put it so that we shall not have two bureaus.

In addition to that, I supposed, from reading this language, that it was the intention to keep the two bureaus. So I had proposed an amendment of this kind, to strike out all in line 4, after the word "commerce," down to and including the word "Statistics," in line 6. That would do away with the proposition to make the chief of the bureau of foreign commerce an assistant in the other bureau; but if it is the purpose of the Senator to consolidate those two and make only one bureau, with one head, then he must change the language in some way. I do not know just how to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator—

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he move to strike out the words which occur there and to insert-

And shall constitute one bureau, with one chief and assistant chief.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Missouri that it was certainly the purpose of this part of the bill to consolidate the two existing bureaus into

Mr. TELLER. If that is what the Senator wants to accomplish, I shall be glad to have the amendment offered, so that we may have a vote on it.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. Mr. VEST. The Senator from Colorado has been Secretary of the Interior, and a very able one, I will say. How is it that we have a Statistical Abstract, which includes not only the statistics of the Treasury Department, but of all the other departments? I understand that to be the authoritative, general statistical abstract of the Government, and while it is true that the Director of the Mint and some bureau officers report a statistical abstract, they are repeated and sent out authoritatively from the general Statistical Abstract office of the Treasury Department?

Mr. COCKRELL. That goes from the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. VEST. It embraces the statistics of all the departments.
Mr. COCKRELL. But it is nevertheless compiled in the office of the Bureau of the Treasury Department and issued by that one

Mr. VEST. That is an authoritative publication for all of the departments, not of the Treasury Department. If I want information about shipping, or the land laws, or the number of fisheries, I simply go to the Statistical Abstract, which is the essence of the reports of all the bureau officers under the head of the Treasury Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague is exactly right. It is in the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department that it is compiled and published.

Mr. VEST. That is true.
Mr. COCKRELL. We have now about twenty-odd volumes that have been issued. It was about twenty-one or twenty-two years ago when the first Statistical Abstract was issued, and it has been kept up annually ever since.

Mr. TELLER. That is a very valuable document, and, as the Senator from Missouri says, it is issued under the control and direction of the Treasury Department. Some years ago, in making a speech, I quoted from the published report of the Director ing a speech, I quoted from the published report of the Director of the Mint and I was caught up by a gentleman who had the Statistical Abstract. It was on a question of the amount of precious metals produced in a country, and I found between two and three million dollars difference in the Statistical Abstract and in the published report. I had quoted without the book, but I happened to have with me the report of the Director of the Mint, and I turned to it and showed that the discrepancy existed in the published reports of the Government. We attention have in the published reports of the Government. My attention having been called to it, I found that to be the case in more than one instance.

We have never had, as a rule, a trained statistician in the men without experience. They are brought together and col-Treasury Department. By the time we have got a man educated laborated not by trained statisticians, but by men who have in the Treasury Department, so that he knows anything about statistics, he is turned out and a new one put in. That has been the rule.

The present statistician in the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department, I think—I say without any discredit to him—had no experience and no particular claim to qualifications to be placed there. He is a man of pretty good ability and industry, and by the time he gets ready to go out and some other person comes in he will be a good statistician. He has done some very good work. I am not going to criticise him at all, but the statistical bureau of the Government of the United States ought to have at its head a man who is a statistician by experience and by nature, because those things go with a man. Every man can not make a statistician of himself, and when he is there he ought to stay there. He should not be removed. It should not be a political office. Then whenever a man takes up a statistical statement, or any conclusion that he may see fit to draw from it, it will have the authority of experience, and, more than that, of learning.

I thought, if the Census Office was turned over to this new bureau, I could see some propriety in having a statistical bureau in the Census Office, and then if the census should be made, as I thought perhaps it would and I was in hopes it would, a permanent bureau, with a limited number of employees in it during the time they were not taking the national census, we could get a fair statistical report on every question.

I do not want to make these criticisms of the statistical work of the Government, which is not perfect by any means, without of the Government, which is not perfect by any means, without saying that in my judgment it is as good as the statistical work of any other government in the world. I have taken some pains and I have had some experience with the examination of the English statistics and the French statistics particularly.

I ought to say, in justice to the Statistical Bureau, that I believe our reports stand well abroad. But they are not perfect, by any means. They are not what we ought to have, and they are not what we can have if we go at it right. This bureau is in the place where it ought to be, but there ought not to be two bureaus there, nor ought a man who is at the head of one to be the assistant in another. The head of the bureau, I repeat, should be a trained statistician. The assistant should be a trained statistician. What is the use of putting a new man in a bureau like that, either at the the use of putting a new man in a bureau like that, either at the head or at the foot, I do not care where you put him? You have got to have mathematicians. It is a work which requires the highest possible talent in the many particulars. I want to get that if we can, and I wish to have the bill so framed that there will be no misunderstanding on the subject, and so that it will be known that there is to be but one bureau of statistics there.

Now, you can not dispense entirely with what need not perhaps be called a bureau, but a statistical division in every other de-partment. Every department should have its statistical division, which should be subordinate to the general statistical bureau, so that before the Secretary of the Interior is allowed to send out statistics they should go to the bureau of statistics for revision, and you never will have a proper statistical bureau and proper statistical statements until you get to that condition.

Now, if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockrell] will move his amendment we will at least accomplish that and have it settled that there is to be but one statistical bureau in the new department

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 4, after the words, "the department of commerce," I move to strike out "and the chief of said bureau of foreign commerce shall be the assistant chief of the said bureau of statistics," and insert:

And the two shall constitute one bureau, to be called the bureau of statistics, with a chief of the bureau and one assistant.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I much regret that I was not in the Chamber when this debate originated. I can not help feeling that we are making a mistake in striking out the Census Bureau from the bill, and when it shall be in order, I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the Census Bureau was stricken out.

I concur most heartily in the suggestions just made by my distinguished friend from Colorado [Mr. Teller]. I believe, sir, it is the common experience of Senators here that we are running mad on the question of statistics. Each bureau that we create starts immediately to develop and spread itself and extend its functions, and it begins to reach out directly after statistics, until every bureau that we have is now furnishing statistics that, in my judgment, are crude and, as the distinguished Senator says, unreliable. Statistics are worse than worthless unless they are accurate, because they are misleading.

Now, we have not far to look for the reason of the inaccuracy of statistics that these several bureaus are gathering. The reason is that they are gathered sometimes by volunteers, always by been selected simply as the head of a bureau, with specific duties imposed upon them. In my judgment, sir, we shall never have any statistics that are reliable until we organize one central bureau and keep it as a permanent organization, with trained men not only at the head but throughout every subdivision.

Now, how are we to arrive at that state of affairs so much to be desired? I venture to say, sir, that if these several statistical bureaus are left attached to the various departments you will never be able to consolidate them, because the minute you attack that bureau and undertake to combine it with something else that bureau and undertake to combine it with something else you arouse jealousy, suspicion, and opposition, and the people interested in promoting that bureau come here and oppose the measure.

But I thought I saw, Mr. President, in this bill a convenient and appropriate method of arriving at the conclusion we all desire, namely, by having all these bureaus and the Census, whether it be made permanent or not, put into this new department, where we may place an organizer who will organize it, as we all desire, into one great, reliable bureau, destroying all jealousy and put-ting at its head men who are capable of furnishing us statistics which are accurate and reliable.

Now, it is the desire of the Committee on Census, of which I have the honor to be a member, in the near future to present to this body the reasons why there ought to be a permanent Census Bureau instead of having each ten years mere spasmodic work—emergency work. I did not suppose that the question would be anticipated or raised by this bill; but let me call your attention, Mr. President, to what we are doing. Now I ask Senators to look on page 4 of this bill, commencing at line 8.

Before I read this language, let it be remembered that under existing law the present Census Bureau is to complete by the 1st day of July, 1902, and publish, the reports on the four principal topics: Population, vital statistics, manufactures, and commerce. That immediately after that the Bureau is commissioned by law to obtain the statistics regarding mines and mining and report that, and then to take up the subject of crimes, pauperism, transportation, and many other topics that are still after that to be collected and published.

Now, commencing on line 8, let us see what we are asking this bureau to do. Mr. TELLER.

Mr. TELLER. On what page?
Mr. QUARLES. On page 4. After taking the provision for the Census Bureau out of this bill, see how completely you are providing here for duplicating these statistics.

In addition to the duties now prescribed by law, to gather, compile, classify, and publish statistical information showing the condition of the foreign and domestic commerce, of the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, and of the transportation facilities of the United States.

That is precisely the work that you have devolved upon this Census Bureau, precisely the work that will engage the energies of that Bureau for the next four or five years.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will complete its work by next June.
Mr. QUARLES. My distinguished friend is certainly mistaken, because by the text of the bill it has until the 1st day of July, 1902, to publish the tables regarding four principal topics—population, vital statistics, manufactures, and commerce—four vital points. After that it takes up mines and mining, and is commissioned to make thorough investigation of mines and mining, the number of men employed, the amount of metal removed, and all that subject. After that it then takes up a dozen other topics, as to which it will consume two or three years to properly prepare the statistics.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow a question simply for information?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.
Mr. FORAKER. Has not the Census Bureau already entered upon the work which the Senator speaks of as contemplated by the law after the four main subjects have been reported upon?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly. Mr. FORAKER. They are already engaged in that work at this time?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.
Mr. FORAKER. That is what I understood.

Mr. FURARLES. That is what a many suggestion?
Mr. QUARLES. Yes, sir.
Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow a suggestion?
Mr. QUARLES. With pleasure.
Mr. TELLER. I understand from perfectly reliable authority that there will be a large force necessarily retained in the Census that there will be a large force necessarily retained in the Census Office for the next four years.

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly; for five years. If I had time to elaborate that, I think I could show the Senate that five years would not be an inadequate period within which to gather accurate statistics concerning the topics already assigned to this Bureau. Then it will require at least three years to prepare for taking the Thirteenth Census, a gigantic task, because there will probably be 100,000,000 people to be enumerated, an immense increase in all manufacturing and industrial lines, our insular possessions also to come in, with all the great work involved in the preparation to enumerate those peoples over there, who speak a different language, who have different customs, with all the other difficulties that cluster about that work which will suggest themselves readily to any Senator thinking of the subject for a moment.

Mr. BACON. The distinguished Senator will pardon me a moment, if I do not interrupt him unduly?

Mr. QUARLES. Certainly.
Mr. BACON. The presentation the Senator makes of the necessity of a general central statistical bureau is certainly a very strong one. The suggestion I desired to make was this—it is rather an interrogatory—whether it would not be better, if we had this great central statistical bureau, that we should have one of its representatives in each of the departments for statistics relative to that department only, having a direct responsibility to the general head, the same as we now have in the Department of Justice—a representative in each one of the departments, who is none the less, while being in that department, a member of the staff of the Department of Justice.

Now, in order that I may not interrupt the Senator again, I wish to say in connection with that thought that it seems to me this presentation in this discussion demonstrates the fact that this bill is not ready for the action of the Senate, and if this particular feature of it has the importance which the debate here evidently discloses, it seems to me that instead of relegating it to the future we should deal with it now. If it is important that we should have this great central statistical bureau, then the scheme should be perfected, in order that the end the Senator so forcibly set forth as desirable should be accomplished, not in the remote but in the immediate future.

Mr. QUARLES. mmediate future.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon], I wish to say that the reason I am opposed to allowing statistics to be gathered piecemeal by several departments is that statistics subserve a different purpose to-day from what they did a few years ago. Formerly statistics were gathered to minister to pride or curiosity, but now, in the evolution of times, they have become a part mercial and scientific necessity. Statistics have become a part of the scientific life and existence of all our industrial organiza-

In order to gather these statistics we must have trained men, not so much in the gathering of them as in the combination of the facts so that they may be utilized. In other words, we ought to have one central bureau of statistics, presided over by trained to have one central bureau of statistics, presided over by trained statisticians, so that we may have a photograph, if you please an instantaneous photograph, of the various activities of this nation. You can only secure that by having trained men.

I have taken occasion, Mr. President, to ascertain what course the nations of Europe have been taking in regard to this matter of statistics, and I find that, instead of having the gathering of statistics scattered through various departments, they almost uniformly have one central bureau, and the average term of employment of the statisticians in those bureaus of Europe is about twenty years, whereas in our country no attention has hitherto been given to this matter, as though it were a matter of very little importance. So I would say to my distinguished friend from Georgia the reason we do not want to leave the gathering of these statistics scattered in these several departments is that we want accurate statistics. We want them speedily gathered, because stale statistics are worthless, and I conceive that we would advance the interests of the business world, the industrial world, the scientific world, if we would keep the Census Bureau here in this department and bring all these other statistical bureaus under the same organizing head that we propose to put in charge of this new department. Then, without friction, without jealousy, simply with a view to the ascertainment of reliable results, organize one bureau that will do all the work and give us complete satisfaction with its results.

Mr. President, one word more. I want to say to Senators that at a later date it is the policy of your Census Committee to bring to the attention of this body another measure, which I think will be esteemed valuable by Senators. We think that this trained bureau, which we propose to have if the Senate shall agree with its committee, is destined to do a great work, and that it will be commissioned not only to furnish the statistics of population that are required by the Constitution, and these other statistics that are grouped with them, but that every year we shall require of that bureau accurate statistics, for instance, regarding the business of cotton ginning, regarding dairies, regarding certain other branches of industry which are required to be represented in these statistics. We shall urge as a reason for doing that, that statistics which are gathered once in ten years may not be reliable, because that particular year may be a year of great prosperity or it may be a year of great commercial depression. So the business inter-ests of this country now require that they should have annually accurate statistics regarding these great industries. There is a growing demand for them, and we have thought, Mr. President, when the time came, you would agree with us that that would be a very desirable thing to be accomplished.

I hope, therefore, Senators, you will not strike the Census Office out of this bill. Leave it in the bill. Do not let us go on duplicating statistics as we are doing now—$100,000 a year paid for partial statistics in the Agricultural Department, $150,000 a year paid for statistics in the Treasury Department, and so on ad infinitum. You have provided for a duplication of the very work that that Census Bureau is now performing. Mr. President, I presume it is not now in order to make the motion I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can demand a separate vote on that amendment in the Senate without moving

Mr. FORAKER. Would there not necessarily be that same duplication if you should leave the provision for the Census Bureau in the bill?

Mr. QUARLES. In reply to that, I will say that my understanding of the matter is this: If the Census Office remains in the new department, and these several statistical bureaus are also put in the new department, it will then become the duty of the head of that department to reorganize the bureaus and avoid all this duplication. I would have one central bureaus all this duplication. I would have one central bureau of statistics

Mr. COCKRELL. How can he do it without a law authorizing him to do it?

Mr. QUARLES. That is a question I hesitate to answer.

Mr. COCKRELL. It ought to be in this bill. That is the very thing we have been contending against. You have conglomerated these things without giving any authority to unite them and harmonize them, just as you did when you provided two chiefs of bureaus, one subordinate to the other. I want to amend that. That is a defect in this bill.

Mr. QUARLES. If that be true, I shall certainly urge upon

Mr. QUARLES. If that be true, I shall certainly urge upon my distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] that he permit this bill to be reviewed. I care nothing about the method pursued, but it seems to me very desirable that we should deal with this matter in some proper way to arrive at this result.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not understand that any Senator is opposed to proper legislation in this bill that will consolidate this matter of obtaining correct statistics. The Senator from this matter of obtaining correct statistics. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] is eminently right in what he has said as to the necessity for changing the present system in regard to obtaining correct calculations and correct statistics upon all these different subjects in which the people are interested. We have here developed in this discussion not the singular fact, but the evident fact, that Congress at some time vested the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department with general jurisdiction over all statistics. That unquestionably was done by authority, and if Senators will go back to the origin and the establishment of that bureau in the Treasury Department they will find that this matter of obtaining correct statistics. The Senator from of that bureau in the Treasury Department they will find that that general jurisdiction was given to it.

Mr. TELLER. No, they will not.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Colorado says they will not. had occasion some twelve or fifteen years ago to examine that question, and my recollection is that that jurisdiction was conferred. If it was not conferred, then that bureau has been actferred. If it was not conferred, then that bureau has been acting without authority and wasting the money of the people in publishing the Statistical Abstract, which has had authoritative force throughout the United States.

force throughout the United States.

One other observation and I am done. The Senator from Wisconsin says it will take five years to complete the further work of the Census Bureau. My information is that three years will be sufficient, and that the force can be cut down to some four or five hundred. At any rate I am satisfied from what I have seen of the operations of the Census Bureau that the work will be well done and economically done, because there has never been a Di-rector of the Census who has proved himself more competent than the present incumbent.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], who is very accurate in his statements, has unfolded to me in more detail than I was acquainted with before the objects of this bill. If one of the objects of this bill is, as now appears, to concentrate in a single department the statistics of the industries and occupations of the people of our own country, and also to gather within its folds statistics of the commerce and industries of all other countries, then I submit to my friend that this bill as now drawn is imperfect.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.
Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about that.
Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] that it would be desirable to have, so far as possible, all statistical information concentrated in a single office; but I submit that this bill falls far short of that consummation. I also think that it will require great care and be difficult to so unite this statistical information as to enable a single department to gather it.

We have now disclosed in this debate the fact that it will be the duty of the Director of the Census to gather statistical information of the Director of the Census to gather statistical information of the mining industries of our country. That work is in process now, or will be in a short time.

We have had for twenty years—the Senator from Missouri in front of me [Mr. Cockrell] will have more accurate information as to the exact number of years—but we have had in the Geological Survey a requirement for many years—

Geological Survey a requirement for many years—
Mr. COCKRELL. About twenty years.—
Mr. ALLISON. About twenty years—that there should be an annual publication of the mineral resources of the United States, and that publication has appeared annually. I have not had the opportunity of knowing whether that volume is now published, but I think it has been published.

Mr. COCKRELL. The volume for 1900 has just been issued.

Mr. GALLINGER. The report for 1900 is just out.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just out. I got it yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I have been absent on a little vacation and have not had an opportunity of looking into it, but I undertake to say that the statistics of the mineral resources of the United States and of the productions of the mines of the United States are reasonably accurate. It is not possible, I will say, that we shall be able to secure absolutely accurate statistical information on all these subjects. It is not possible for us in collating statison all these subjects. It is not possible for us in collating statis-tics of the industries and occupations of our people to make them absolutely accurate. How are we going to ascertain exactly the number of tons of coal produced from all of the mines of the United States by a special bureau appointed for that purpose? There must be a corps of people who are not under oath, who are not officials of the Government, who must be relied upon to furnish the statistics respecting the coal production of the United States, and most of that must be voluntary. Those statistics will be sufficiently accurate to compare our coal production with the production of the other countries of the world.

How are we going to ascertain the number of bushels of oats or of wheat or of corn produced in all the States of this Union? That can only be done, I submit to the Senate, by what might be called expert estimates. We are trying in the State of Iowa, in which I live, to ascertain the number of bushels of corn raised in which I live, to ascertain the number of bushels of corn raised in that State during the last year. We have a State statistician, whose duty it is to ascertain that, and who does ascertain it in the best obtainable way and at the least cost, but whether the production of corn in my State is 250,000,000 bushels or 251,000,000 bushels or 250,000,005 bushels can not be ascertained by any system of statistics that may be presented here or elsewhere.

Take the gold supply. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] mentioned a moment ago that he was led into a missake by looking at the Statistical Abstract and finding that it did not as looking at the Statistical Abstract and finding that it did not exactly agree with the report of the Director of the Mint. While those who compile the Statistical Abstract in the Treasury Department avail themselves of every opportunity, as respects the for-eign and domestic commerce and the productions of our country and of other countries, they must, in the very nature of things, avail themselves of the statistical information acquired from other departments and other bureaus. So that whoever compiles that Statistical Abstract in the Treasury Department undoubtedly avails himself of the information furnished by the Director of the Mint, who himself is gathering statistics regarding certain things which can be easily and more accurately ascertained by the Director of the Mint than by, probably, any other officer of the Gov-

Mr. COCKRELL. He is confined to gold and silver principally.
Mr. ALLISON. His report is confined absolutely to gold and silver; but our Director of the Mint is in correspondence with the directors of all the mints in the world; he is in close correspondence from time to time with the experts in all countries who have information respecting the annual production of gold and silver. It is not necessary for this new statistician of this new bureau to undertake by original processes to ascertain these facts.

So with the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not know that the statistical division of the Agricultural Department gathers all its own statistics, but I do know that its statistics are as reasonably accurate as they can be made; and there is no bureau or department of the Government which can so well and so accurately assection the statistics are as reasonably assection.

certain the statistics necessary to be inserted in the general volume of our productions as the Department of Agriculture.

So it is that the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department now, instead of making original researches on this subject, go to the Agricultural Department, and embody in the annual abstract the things which the Secretary of Agriculture has been able to ascertain. Therefore, if I want to know the number of bushels of corn or wheat or oats produced, I would go to that Statistical Abstract and ascertain it. As now published, it may not be exactly accurate or within a million or two millions of bushels of the total amount produced, but I can ascertain what it is in the aggregate sufficient for any commercial purpose or any industrial purpose.

Then, take another class of information to be sought here, and that is brought within the purview of this bill-that is, statistics of transportation. These are all at hand and can be obtained with reasonable accuracy. We have now in our Interstate Commerce Commission a special statistician, whose duty it is to report annually to Congress the statistics respecting the transportation interests of our country by rail, and these statistics are printed. The general statistician, as contemplated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Quarles] and provided for in this bill, I now for the first time understand will, of course, seek these resources in order to ascertain these facts. They are well known; they are ascertained without great cost to the Government, and they are accurate because they are transcripts of the statements made by the great railways that transport our products by rail. So it is with our statistics as respects our commerce by sea and the interior rivers and waterways of our country.

Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the general suggestion that there ought to be somewhere a place where these statistics can be collated, compiled, and published in a single volume. I supposed that was already done by the Bureau of Statistics in the Treesury Department, which is proposed by this bill to be trans-Treasury Department, which is proposed by this bill to be transferred. That annual abstract is not only an abstract of the receipts of customs, of the amount of imports, and so on, but it embraces the entire range of our products and prices of commodities.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Census Committee, proposes to transmute the law that we passed in 1899 into a law permanently establishing the Census Bureau, which otherwise would go out of existence by force of the law creating it when its work, which is now in hand, is con-

The Senator from Wisconsin, in his most excellent speech, has only confirmed me in the suggestion I made. He is proposing here to bring forward an elaborate scheme, which, if I understand it, I shall give my support to-a scheme to make the Census Bureau a permanent one, and a single line, when that comes here, will a permanent one, and a single line, when that comes here, will put it into this new law. If it is wise to put it there, and if we can so arrange this bill as hereafter to provide for all this statistical information to be embodied in this new department of commerce rather than in the Department of the Secretary of the Treasury, I shall not object; but I myself do not like to see a suggestion that here it is proposed to consolidate bureaus when in fact there is no consolidation. I look at the various bureaus that would be turned over to this new department, and I find that the would be turned over to this new department, and I find that the Geological Survey is to be continued under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. It is just as germane to the operation of that Department as to any other. So I find other things in the bill in the same direction.

Now it is proposed that this new department shall deal with the foreign commerce of our country, and shall also from year to year collect statistics of the industries of our country, and not only so, but that it shall promote our industries, so that it is to be given enlarged powers. I do not object to that, although I think our industries have been fairly well promoted during the last few years by private enterprise and the exercise of judgment as respects these industries by private citizens.

Mr. President, I should not have made these observations but for the fact that I understand the Senator from Wisconsin intends to endeavor to reinsert these provisions. If the Census Bureau is to be provided for by a provision in this bill, it should be inserted with a great many amendments; and I am not sure that I am in favor of the suggestion made by the Senator that this Bureau shall take into its hands the statistics relating to the mining industries of our country and that the Geological Survey shall be denuded of its force, although it has a force now, and a trained force, that has been there for more than twenty years. It has at its head one of the meet accomplished its head one of the most accomplished men in our country as to mining statistics.

Mr. COCKRELL. Dr. Day?

Mr. ALLISON. Dr. Day. I do not know but that if the Director of the Census has the acumen I think he has, he has already availed himself of Dr. Day's skill and force and energy on the subject of mining statistics, because he has them all at hand and has been engaged for twenty years in publishing them in a valuable annual volume.

Mr. QUARLES. That is entirely true, as I understand. Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the suggestion made first by the Senator from Colorado needs careful consideration, and perhaps the bill needs some further amendment. I should like, of course, for one, to see some modification in this particular amendment as respects our consular service.

It does seem to me that the only way whereby the statistics of foreign trade, prices, etc., can be ascertained economically is through our consuls and our consuls-general. They are under the State Department. It is true there is a sort of halfway transfer of the jurisdiction of the State Department over these consuls, but it seems to me, in view of the work they have done in the past few years, that it would be wiser for this new department to avail itself of the work that the Secretary of State is doing in this direction, and then compile in its annual volume whatever information is procured.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, is not that precisely what is provided for in section 5?

Mr. ALLISON. It may be.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is there provided that-

All consular officers of the United States, including consul-generals, consuls, and commercial agents, are hereby required, and it is made a part of their duty, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to gather and compile, from time to time, upon the request of the secretary of commerce, useful and material information and statistics in respect to the commerce, industries, and markets of the countries and places to which such consular officers are accredited.

And so forth.

It seems to me this bill takes care of that very clearly and very fully.

Mr. ALLISON. It may. Mr. LODGE. That portion of the bill, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, was very carefully considered and amended the other

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I merely call attention to it, not that I wish to interfere with it.

Mr. President, I have entered this discussion with hesitation, because I have been absent for some weeks and I have not had an opportunity of giving such attention to the bill as perhaps I should have given it. I am in favor of the establishment of the new department of commerce, and I am in favor of giving it whatever jurisdiction such a department should have, but I do not think it is wise at this time, by a single statute, to undertake to change great bureaus of our Government from one head to another, and with that change, to change so many officers without due con-

I heard with interest the suggestions of the Senator from Minnesota to-day as respects these various bureaus. I think some of them have no more relation to this new department than they have to the departments with which they are now allied. Mr. Wright, who is now the head of the Department of Labor, has nothing, it seems to me, that should be supervised at all by the head of a department. I think he is doing most excellent work. It is scientific work; it is educational work; it has no special relational work; it has no special relationships the second tion to the new department or to any existing department. So with the Fish Commission. It is a scientific bureau. It is not now under any department, so far as I know. The head of that Commission, I believe, is doing very good work.

However, I do not care to discuss this matter further to-night, but I wish to say that if it is the object and purpose of the promoters of this bill, and especially the object and purpose of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, who is chairman of the Centille of the content of the con sus Committee, to endeavor to gather in under the direction of the census all these various statistical matters, I believe the whole question should be relegated to his bill when it comes in, and if he furnishes a comprehensive method whereby it can be done I shall favor it.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask a question, if I may, before the Senator from Colorado proceeds; but I will wait if he would rather proceed. I simply desire to ask—
Mr. TELLER. I was going to suggest that the bill would require more discussion, and I have been told that there is a desire to have an executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say that the debate to-day, I think, with the exception of the remarks of the Senator in charge of the bill, has been entirely in the hands of Senators who are not on the Committee on Commerce. I think the bill for that reason ought to go over, and I should myself like a few minutes at some time, being a member of the Committee on Commerce, to make some observations. I am going to try to persuade the distinguished Senator from Missouri, who usually is right, that the amendment he proposes is not necessary.

The consolidation of these statistical bureaus is made absolutely as clear in the bill as it now stands as it will be if the amendment is adopted. However, that is a matter of not very much consequence. I think the bill will have to go over.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts if I have the floor.

I do not wish to take the floor from the Senator. Mr. HOAR. Mr. GALLINGER. I supposed the Senator from Colorado had concluded his remarks.

Mr. TELLER. No.
Mr. HOAR. I merely wish to ask a question which I dare say may have been answered during the debate, as I have been obliged to be absent from the Senate Chamber nearly all the time.

What building or what quarters will be the home of this department? I suppose some time or other, of course, there will be a new building. I should like to inquire, because we can not tell what may get through the two Houses hereafter, whether the bill should not contain some provision, which it does not now contain as to the right of the provision, which it does not now contain, as to the right of the proposed new department to use rooms until the new building is completed? Perhaps that question has already been answered in debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been raised.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask what is the plan about that.

We have certain buildings which by law are appropriated to certain departments of the Government. Now, we create a secretary, an assistant secretary, and some other officials, I believe, and then we say that hereafter certain enumerated bureaus and officials shall belong to the department of commerce. Do they retain by any law their right to remain in the Treasury building, for instance, or in the Interior Department building? Should not the bill have some provision for that? That is the point to which I wish to call attention. I do not wish to interfere at all with my friend's bill. EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to submit a few observations, but I do not desire to do it to-night. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 21, 1902, at 12 o'clock m.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Sherman in the chair, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman— Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I would like to have some agreement with the gentleman in charge of the bill as to the time for general debate on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that ought to be done in the House; at the same time I am quite willing to have an understanding with the gentleman from Georgia about it.

How much time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am not prepared to say. I suppose it rests with the minority leader on the floor, Mr. RICHARDSON. I am perfectly willing to let it run along, and a little later on perwe can come to an understanding.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think there will be no difficulty in reaching a conclusion. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois desires to occupy the floor, and at the conclusion of his remarks we can come to some agreement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to occupy the floor any considerable time upon this bill. This is a bill known as an "urgent deficiency bill," which is somewhat of a misnomer. While it cares for deficiencies in small amounts for former fiscal years, ascertained by the auditing of accounts, in the main it is in fact a bill for the service of the current fiscal year where the appropriations are not sufficient for the service; so that it is in fact a bill for the service of the current year, appropriations in the main not having been made.

The bill carries in the aggregate $16,701,445.34. The principal items are: For collecting revenues from customs, $1,850,000. Gentlemen are aware that there is a permanent appropriation for the collection of customs of five and one-half millions of dollars, to which is added, as I recollect, fines and forfeitures; but for many years past, with the growth of the customs service, we have had to supplement that permanent appropriation, and the amount necessary to meet it for the remainder of this fiscal year is $1,850,000.

For collecting the internal revenue, $225,000. This is for a service which the law calls for, and would be performed substantially whether this appropriation was made or not, and provision would have to be made for it in the future.

Payment of rebate on tobacco tax, $3,150,000. That is an amount rendered necessary by the enactment of the law at the last session of Congress reducing taxation. A rebate was provided to the manufacturers and jobbers, or those having original packages, as I recollect it, of the tax. It has been ascertained, substantially, that it will require this amount of money, $3,150,000, to pay it. Most of it has been absolutely ascertained, and the money is due. While ordinarily the general deficiency bill, which would be enacted in May or June, would carry this item it was thought best to insert it in this bill. The money is due these people under the law, and they ought to have it. The Treasury is amply able to pay it, and, so far as the legitimate expenditures of the Government are concerned, it seems to your committee proper that we had better get this three millions out of the Treasury in payment of obligations absolutely due rather than to care for the sinking as I recollect it, of the tax. It has been ascertained, substantially, of obligations absolutely due rather than to care for the sinking fund with the purchase of bonds to this amount.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $601,000. There is a kindred item which I have not the memorandum of here, but which the bill carries, for an increase of force in the office of the Treasurer of the United States and a small increase in the division of loans and currency, the force in these two places being now on duty and paid for from the general appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It was thought best to catch them up in the appropriate bureaus and divisions. It is in fact not an increase in force. In the course of the investigation was found that in years to come as long as we have the criticism. we found that in years to come, as long as we have the existing legislation touching paper currency, there will be from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty million notes, not in the aggregate, but that many notes, mostly of $10 value and under, that will have to be printed, and that explains the increase in labor and material in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; and also explains the authorization of the additional division which is now in fact in service in the office of the Treasurer of the United

Mr. CUMMINGS. I understand that the deficiency is caused by this extra bureau taking the printing of the money from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. CANNON. The deficiency is caused by the great increase of service in the printing of United States notes, silver certificates, and greenbacks, the denominations printed being in the main $10 and under; and the increase is so extraordinary that more paper, more labor, and more cognate force of counters, etc., in the appropriate office, that of the United States Treasurer, are required to handle this great output.

Mr. PAYNE. That has grown out of the currency bill that we passed in the last Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; it has grown out of the passage of the currency bill, which I think I may safely say members on both sides of the House are very glad to have passed.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that at the present time the national banks are having their circulation canceled just as fast as they

Mr. CANNON. I think not, although that matter in no way affects this item. This increase of appropriation for labor and material in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the incidental increase in the Treasurer's office is for the purpose of handling exclusively Treasury notes which are issued in exchange for silver dollars, as well as United States notes of small denomination. nations, and gold certificates.

Mr. CLARK. Does this bill contemplate the permanent appointment of three extra counters?

Mr. CANNON. No; because these counters are already in the service, and have been for over twelve months past. This bill catches them up and appropriates for them under the Treasury Department, where they are performing their duty by detail, and it thus relieves the general appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. CLARK. What I want to get at is this: The statment was given out by the Treasury authorities not long ago that the national banks are having their circulation canceled as fast as they can under the law; that applications were already on hand for the cancellation of $3,000,000 in January and $3,000,000 in February, and that by the end of the year the amount canceled would equal the extraordinary amount issued under the act of 1900. Now, if that is true, what is to prevent the necessity for additional counters?

Mr. HILL. Let us call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clark] to the fact that the statement he has made has no bearing on the present case, because the national banks pay for the redemption of their bills and the issue of new bills.

Mr. CLARK. But if they quit issuing the bank notes, then there is no use for three additional counters.

Mr. CANNON. I think I understand the question of the gentleman from Missouri, and will answer the query. If he had honored me with his close attention heretofore, I think it would not have been necessary for him to ask the question.

Here is the condition. Under the currency law passed two years ago greenbacks and silver certificates substantially are printed in denominations of $10 and under and gold certificates are printed according to demand—ordinarily large certificates. Now, under the operation of that law the number of notes has inincreased from, say, about 75,000,000 to 80,000,000, that it has been necessary to issue annually, until now there are over 125,-000,000—I do not mean the amount of money in the aggregate, I mean that many separate notes—that have to be printed. For these the paper must be furnished and handled, and it is perfectly apparent from our investigation that from this time on there will be some 140,000,000 to 160,000,000 different notes issued annually. The lifetime of a note, if time is allowed to season the paper so that it may get thoroughly dry, is about four years. For the handling of this great increase there has been no corresponding increase in the number of counters, etc., so that either the Department must fail to handle this currency or counters, etc., must be appointed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and de-tailed as the law permits to the office of the Treasurer. This is all strictly formal and legal, and we found on investigation that it was to be permanent. And I have no doubt that for the next fiscal year and the next there will have to be a further increase of these counters to handle the silver certificates, the United States Treasury notes, the gold certificates. But this has no more to do with the bank-note circulation than a duck has to do with mathematical astronomy. [Laughter.]

Now, this appropriation picks up those people who are employed, in fact, and paid, as I have described, from the general appropriation, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and puts them where they perform the service required, namely, under the Treasurer of the United States.

As to what retirement of national-bank notes there will be I do not know. I do know, however, that it would be impossible, in the time indicated, to retire anything near the amount the gentleman from Missouri has specified. But let that be as it may, all that is done at the expense of the national banks and does not affect at all this matter of appropriation which I have been explaining.

Now I will go on to the next item:

Military posts at Manila, $500,000.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield a moment right there? My understanding is that the Committee on Military Affairs has entire jurisdiction of establishing military posts, and there is no law establishing any such posts at Manila. This bill provides for law establishing any such posts at Mania. This bill provides for the establishment of a post there and appropriates accordingly. I do not know that I want to raise any point of order on this item; but I wish to call attention to the question as to whether a deficiency bill can appropriate for posts not established by law, and at the same time, in same section, establish a new post.

My understanding is that a bill of this character, coming from the Committee on Appropriations, carries on the work of the Government provided for by law where Congress has not made apple provision in the regular or in the ordinary way for such Government provided for by law where Congress has not made ample provision in the regular or in the ordinary way for such service. And while in this case I recognize the necessity, as the gentleman has suggested, for the appropriation, it should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration and the establishment of a post before an appropriation could be made for it. That is the point I have been seeking to make.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; and my friend from Iowa, ordinarily so correct, if he had thought for a moment, would have discovered that he had found only a mare's-nest in this suggestion. Under the rules of the House the general deficiency bill is committed to the Committee on Appropriations for considera-gestion. Under the rules of the House the general deficiency bill is committed to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and action. The general deficiency bill is a bill to care for the service for the current fiscal year where the regular annual appropriation bills fail to do so in full. So this bill, to the extent of $16,000,000, sweeps all over the public service and makes up the shortages resulting from a nonappropriation or an insufficient appropriation in the regular bills, and meets for the current fiscal year all of the demands of the public service that are unprovided for between now and the 30th day of next June.

Mr. HULL. I do not think my friend from Illinois meets the point that I have suggested, exactly.

Mr. CANNON. I think I did. But in what way have I failed to do so?

Mr. HULL. My friend has not answered my question. point is that on the establishment of a military post at Manila that question would naturally and necessarily come before the that question would naturally and necessarily come before the Committee on Military Affairs, be considered as a separate measure, and an appropriation would not be in order on the military appropriation bill, and until the Congress of the United States had first passed on the question whether it would establish a post at that point or not there can be no deficiency. If the Committee on Appropriations can establish a military post at Manila on a deficiency bill, or upon any other bill, they can establish it in any other part of the United States by the same means, and my point is that on the establishment of that post the legislation so providing ought to be first considered by the House and the point is that on the establishment of that post the legislation so providing ought to be first considered by the House and the Senate, and appropriation bills, as a matter of course, in the legitimate line of expenditure, would follow the action taken by the two bodies of Congress in that regard.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, it is quite competent for the gentleman, if he desires to do so, to invoke the rule and make a point of order on this provision when we reach it under the five-minute rule.

the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULL. I was only calling the gentleman's attention to the matter, and hoped he would be able to explain it so that a point of order would be unnecessary.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). And I shall have no possible objection, in the event that the point of order is made, and after being heard a short time I shall be ready to submit the matter to the Chair for a ruling. I have no anxiety about the matter one way or the other, except as the public service should be properly way or the other, except as the public service should be properly cared for.

This bill—with reference to the question that the gentleman has suggested, if the point of order is made—stands upon the same authority as the regular Army appropriation bill would stand, because it is a general deficiency bill, covering the whole line of the public service for the balance of the fiscal year. It is an Army bill, a Navy bill, a sundry civil bill, a deficiency bill, a legislative bill, a diplomatic bill, and runs through all of the public service, bounded only by the needs of that service, from this date until the 30th day of June. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, with his consent.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not hear the colloquy between the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will have order upon the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be seated and public business will be suspended until order is restored.

Mr. CANNON. Now if the gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask a question, I shall yield to him with pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The report accompanying this bill is quite brief, although the bill carries a very large sum an unusually large sum for a deficiency bill. On page 17 this provision for the establishment of a military post at Manila, $500,000, is found. Is that in any sense of the word a deficiency, I would ask the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. It is in every sense of the word a deficiency.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is there any law providing for the post, making an appropriation for its establishment, heretofore passed by Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, that matter we will discuss under the five-minute rule if the gentleman from Tennessee sees proper to submit the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not, I think, inappropriate to discuss the question in general debate. That was my purpose in rising.

I ask the gentleman, therefore, is there a law establishing a military post at Manila for which an insufficient appropriation has been made?

Mr. CANNON. Is there any law? I will say to my friend that the military post in the city of Manila, which now accommodates nineteen hundred people in the Spanish posts and the private residences, is already in existence to that extent. And now I will play Yankee for a little while myself. [Laughter.] I will ask the gentleman if there is any law that would prohibit the maintenance of the post after it has been established there?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is not the proposition. This is something new in the bill. Now, I ask if there is any law authorizing you to put this appropriation in the bill? It is called authorizing you to put this appropriation in the bill? It is called a "deficiency" here. Where is the original law?

Mr. CANNON. Well, that is a matter for the consideration of the House, if the gentleman chooses to invoke the point of order. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But I want information from the gentleman from Illinois which may make it unnecessary to invoke the point of order. I ask the gentleman to state whether there is such a law or not.

Mr. CANNON. I say there is an Army of the United States.

The Army is in service in the Philippine Islands. In the garrison at Manila are nineteen hundred soldiers, who are housed partially in the old Spanish barracks, partially, perhaps, in captured buildings, partially in rented buildings. The Army is there now under the law. It is necessary to clothe them and to subsist them, to house them in some instances in temporary barracks and they are using them, in some instances in temporary barracks, and they are using these buildings as permanent barracks. Now, in the operations of the Army, for the purpose of efficient operations, it is necessary, in the opinion of the President and of the War Department, to construct barracks about 6 miles out from Manila that will cost $500,000. If there be any law under which this appropriation would be apt in any bill without legislation, it is the law that organizes the Army, that has placed it in the Philippines, and makes its necessary operations important to the public service.

Now, having disposed of the pedoddles—the technical points—
I will go on and in a word speak of this matter upon its merits.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman pardon me? If I understand him, this provision is intended to make a permanent military post 6 miles from the city of Manila.

Mr. CANNON. In round numbers, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And there now is no law and there never has been any law on our statute books establish.

and there never has been any law on our statute books establish-and there never has been any law on our statute books establishing and locating an army post at that point.

Mr. CANNON. And there never has been any law upon our statute books establishing and locating a temporary post, and yet they exist by the score all over the islands.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I will ask the gentleman if he does not know that this proposition is utterly obnoxious to the location of the statute of the statu to the rule of the House which provides that there shall not be new legislation on a general appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman thinks so, he has his right, as every other member of the Committee of the Whole has, when the item is reached under the five-minute rule, to make the point of order.

Mr. RICHARTON of Tennessee. I want the information.

Mr. CANNON. I could not prevent him if I would, and I would not if I could, provided he thought it his duty to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman understands his duty far better than I do and I will not undertake to lecture him, because he has more experience and more ability in these matters than I have—

Mr. CANNON. Thank you.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But as I understand it, it is the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of these great bills carrying all these enormous sums of money, to give the House the information when we ask for it. The gentleman knows whether there is any law. All of us can not know that without a good deal of investigation. He knows Yea or nay will answer the question which I have propounded, and it is an appropriate question to ask in debate; because I may not be here during the debate under the five-minute rule if there is law for this appropriation; while I would try to be here, possibly, if there is no law for it. Now, will the gentleman tell us, yea or nay, is there any law authorizing this army

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman, and I do it courteously, recognizing his right, or the right of the gentleman from Tennessee, or the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], or of any other gentleman from any other State, to arise and courteously ask any possible question that will shed light upon this bill; and I think I never have failed, and do not believe I ever will fail to reply courteously to questions wherever they come from, or to candidly answer them. I think I have answered the gentleman's question, but I will answer it again. If the gentleman asks me if there has been enacted anywhere a law which reads, "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, and so forth, acted by the Senate and House of Representatives, and so forth, that there be, and is hereby, established, 6 miles from the city of Manila in the Philippine Islands, a permanent Army post, and the limit of cost thereof shall be $500,000," with or without an appropriation, I will say to him that I am not aware that any such act has ever been passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, then—
Mr. CANNON. Let me finish.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. CANNON. Now as to whether under the general organi-

Mr. CANNON. Now, as to whether, under the general organization of the Army in the field and in the service, this appropriation is in order without specific prior legislation authorizing it, that is a matter depending upon the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, when he is invited to make his decision upon a point of order, and when reached it will be for him to pass upon. Now I have said all I care to say about that and Now I have said all I care to say about that, and will await the five-minute rule to develop anything further.

Now, having answered the gentleman's question courteously and fully, I will speak of the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman does that will he allow me one further question?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman now having conceded that there is no law authorizing this appropriation—

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman must not put words in my mouth and undertake to commit me by my failing to respond.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman says there is also a my mouth and undertake to commit me by my failing to respond.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman says there is a law, I will not say it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]
Mr. CANNON. Go on.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will take it back if the gentleman says there is a law.
Mr. CANNON. Oh, well; while the courts of the county of Vermilion thirty years ago did certify that I did practice law there [laughter], it has been almost thirty years since I attempted to practice law; and before I came to Congress and since I have been here I have grown to be a little doubtful of the legal learnbeen here I have grown to be a little doubtful of the legal learning of a gentleman that gets up and says "there is a law," or "there is no law," because sometimes I have found that wise men are mistaken on each side.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not going to press that question any further.

Mr. CANNON. Whether this appropriation is authorized under

Mr. CANNON. Whether this appropriation is authorized under the rules of the House is a question for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to pass on, subject to appeal when the point of order is made, and not for me to decide.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I do not intend to press that question any further; it seems to be growing rather unpleasant to my friend from Illinois, and I am not inclined to put him in that category. But is there any other provision in this bill, carrying over 16,000,000, that is new legislation?

Mr. CANNON. I think so, one or two

Mr. CANNON. I think so—one or two.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think—if I may be pardoned for interrupting the gentleman further—that we ought to have our attention called in reports to new legislation. It is almost impossible when a bill is reported here one day and considered the next for members to inform themselves as to what is new legislation and what is not new legislation. I know the gentleman is able, and do not mean to reflect upon him in any way; but we are entitled to have our attention called to what is new legis-

Mr. CANNON. I said I thought there was. I have referred in the meantime an inquiry to one not a member of this House, in whose recollection I have great confidence, and I am inclined to think, after that inquiry, there is no provision carrying legislation upon the bill. Nobody can state that as an absolute truth, because possibly there may be some appropriation here or there not authorized by existing law; but to the best of my knowledge and belief, after having refreshed my recollection by the opinion of an expert, I am inclined to think there is not; and it is the practice of the Committee on Appropriations in its reports to call tice of the Committee on Appropriations in its reports to call attention when changes in existing law are made by appropria-

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have order.
The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.
Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen, I am quite sure, will bear with me, when they recollect the size of this Hall, that a little conversation about us makes it impossible for a member who is talking to even hear himself. Now, I will say further to the gentleman—

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman goes any further, will he permit another question? I have not had time to examine as carefully as I would like, but how much of the $1,376,831.08 for the War Department is for expenditures in the Dislimina Archiveleng.

Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will refer to the bill he will see that that is the only item that goes directly to the Philippines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as a further proof that it is impossible for anybody to determine just how much express legislation there is upon many of these points, I think it entirely proper under the treaty with Spain, by which we acquired the Philippines, even if there was no other legislation, there is upon the United States certain duties toward the people of the Philippine Islands in the performance of which the rese of the Army is temperatily necessity. formance of which the use of the Army is temporarily necessary; and if so, all other things, including the establishment of a permanent post at Manila, would go as incidents. Now, then, I will refer to the necessity for this post upon its merits.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman to say that it will be necessary to have an Army post on account of our temporary military occupation of the Philippines.

Mr. CANNON. No; Idid not say that. If so, I want to correct

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, the gentleman had a

Mr. WILITAMS of Mississippi. Well, the gentleman had a lapsus lingua.

Mr. CANNON. On account of our present occupation, temporarily active and absolutely indispensable, and even if permanent occupation, with a small force, precisely as we have it in New Mexico, in Kansas, on the Sound, in New York, and in Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The question which I wanted to ask the gentleman is this—it is twofold in its nature: Is it usual in providing for an Army post to use the language used in usual, in providing for an Army post, to use the language used in this bill in this connection—a permanent Army post?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think it wise at present to attempt to forejudge a great question that is pending before the American people by using that language?

Mr. CANNON. I think, under existing laws and obligations, from every standpoint it is wise to have a permanent Army post at Manila; just as wise and necessary as it is to have a permanent post in Ulinois or in New York post in Illinois or in New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One more question. Does not the gentleman think he could answer his purpose as well by just making an appropriation for an Army post at Manila, without either using the word "permanent" or "temporary," and not attempt to forejudge that question? If you could get that you would accomplish your purpose and disarm a great deal of the hostility to the appropriation, and get just what you wanted; you would get the Army post.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is quite competent to make a motion to strike out the word "permanent" when we come to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. I will say to him, however, that I assumed that the word "permanent" was in because my friend challenged it; but I am informed, and I see on looking at the bill, that the word "permanent" is not in it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In that connection I wish to say that I had not read the bill myself. I was told by a gentleman that it was in there, and I gathered from the language of the gentleman from Illinois that it was in, and for that reason I asked

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am willing to shoulder up the word "permanent" as if it were there. In my judgment, if this appropriation is made there will be, longer than I live or any man lives that listens to me, and ought to be, an Army post at Manila.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois pardon me for another interrogatory?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to urge now that there is the same necessity, or a like necessity, existing for the establishment of this Army post at Manila as there is for an Army post in the other Territories that he has mentioned?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and more. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did the gentleman ever know, in his long and able experience as a member of this House, of an Army post being established on an urgent deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. CANNON. I don't know that I ever did. They may or they may not have been so established, but what does that signify?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Your rule says that you shall not do it

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The law says that you shall not put it on an appropriation bill, and I can produce that law.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Tennessee is seeking to take my time Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Not at all. I will give you my hour.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). And to play upon words. But I want to say to the gentleman that if there were no other law—and I want to say to the gentleman that if there were no other law—and I want to say to the gentleman that if there were no other law—and I believe there is other law, which I will put it in later-I say that the treaty places upon us an obligation to protect life and property in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CUMMINGS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is it not now within the power of the general commanding in the Philippine Islands to establish a post there as a military necessity, if required?

Mr. CANNON. In my opinion it is not only in his power, but it is his duty to do everything that he can to properly forward the Army operations from every standpoint in the Philippine Islands, and I have in effect said that.

Now having given almost helf an houring time to the left in

Now, having given almost half an hour's time to the buffeting of this little technical ball that was first kicked by the gentleman, chairman of Military Affairs, and then kicked by the leader of the minority, and then kicked by the gentleman, able as he is, of the minority, and then kicked by the gentleman, able as he is, from Mississippi, and having been switched off and given this thirty minutes' time to the pedoddles of the situation—whether you shall do it after you wash your hands or before you wash your hands; whether it should be blessed and baptized by immersion or sprinkling—having gone through that variety of discussion, I will get down to the merits and speak of the necessity for this appropriation. [Laughter.] Manila is the principal city in the Philippine Islands. Mr. Chairman, I will take my seat until gentlemen have brought their conversation to a close.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The committee will please be in order, and those gentlemen wishing to converse will please retire to the cloakroom.

will please retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. CANNON. The Army is in the Philippines, the United States is there, the flag is there. The treaty sends it there, and the law sends it there. We will stay there, in my judgment, for ever and a day.

But let this be as it may, while we do stay there we have got to so appropriate and administer the law so as to perform the functions of the Government of the United States.

Now, what is the fact? Nineteen hundred soldiers are quartered in the city of Manila, in captured barracks, in private houses, in abandoned public barracks, mixed all up with the civil population. This is not a good thing for the soldiers; it is not a good thing for the inhabitants; it is not a good thing for soldiers and inhabitants in the United States from the standpoint of discipline and every other consideration. Therefore in New York our soldiers are isolated. The case is the same in Illinois, and in every Army post in this country. Some years ago we abandoned the Army post in the city of Omaha and placed our troops at Fort Cook, 8 or 10 or 12 miles away.

Now, with these insufficient quarters in the city of Manila, being compelled to have that as a center of operation, the time has come compelled to have that as a center of operation, the time has come to establish an Army post for the purpose of housing soldiers from time to time, as they are concentrated at that point. That is the whole story. It was believed by your committee that the expense ought to be borne by the Treasury of the United States and not from the insular revenues. One reason is that while these insular revenues are much larger than we expected and larger than they ever have been—I mean the revenues going into the insular treasury—yet there is so much to do there that ought to be done-improvements of rivers and harbors, building of roads, building of schoolhouses, and carrying on the system of education, and a hundred other things-that we did not believe that at this time the insular revenues ought to be further weakened by the expense of constructing this Army post. Outside of that we believed that the United States should construct this post, which is to be a permanent post, from its own Treasury, and should have the title thereto in the same way as it has constructed the post in Illinois and every other Army post in the United States. drop that matter right there.

We provide for a new Soldiers' Home at Johnson City, Tenn. We put a limitation where none now exists. After inquiry, we find that the post can be completed for $1,150,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars has already been appropriated. We put a limit upon the cost, and we appropriate $350,000. We have tried to contract for complete construction. After inquiry and consultation with at least a portion of the Tennessee delegation, we found that this provision was satisfactory to them and also meets the approval of the National Board of Managers.

Now I come to the next item:

Armor and armament for new naval vessels, $4,000,000.

A great sum; and the whole story is told in three or four words—increase of the Navy heretofore authorized. The immediate matter that makes this great sum necessary is the fact that under the contract for armor plate, made in pursuance of the law which was passed almost a year ago, the armor plate is being more rapidly delivered than the Department supposed it could be, greatly to the gratification of the Department and greatly expediting the construction of our large battle ships.

Now, I come to another item:

Postal service, $2,454,000.

This consists in part of deficiencies where the law calls for the This consists in part of deficiencies where the law calls for the service—inland transportation—railway transportation. The most important item in it, however—the most interesting, perhaps, to members of Congress—is $220,000 for rural-delivery service. The amount appropriated for the current year was $3,500,000—quite sufficient—as much as the Post-Office Department desired. During the last session of Congress many gentlemen were apprehensive that this appropriation would not be sufficient. But the postal agents and inspectors have become efficient and are doing more rapid work than they formerly did. Between this time and the 1st day of June next there will be 1,800 additional routes to be provided for. If we make this appropriaadditional routes to be provided for. If we make this appropria-tion, they will be established in February, March, April, and May. If we do not make this appropriation of $220,000, they will be estab-lished, a few in April, the remainder in May and on the 1st of June. That is all there is of this matter. It is a mere difference in the time of establishing the routes. We thought that as fast as they were ready the service ought to go on.

Mr. LACEY. Allow me a single suggestion. It seems to be necessary that there should be some increase in the compensation of the carriers in the rural-delivery service, whose yearly allowance now is only $500. The expenses of their teams and their ance now is only $500. The expenses of their teams and their support has been very greatly increased. Has that question been considered in making up this deficiency?

Mr. CANNON. No; this deficiency does not cover that matter at all, because that would require legislation; and it was believed that if such legislation was to be had it should come from the appropriate committee—the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. But I will say to my friend that I think it entirely likely that there ought to be some increase made in the compensation of rural-delivery carriers; but neither he nor I need lie awake at nights agonizing about this question.

This service has legs enough and is going to have carriers enough scattered all over the country to insure all necessary increases. That question does not bother me. What I am somewhat bothered about is the apprehension that they may reenforce the great army of employees elsewhere in the post-office service and possibly in the not distant future may require some increases which, from the standpoint of economy and perhaps efficient service, are not strictly necessary.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman is no doubt aware that there are now constant resignations in this force on account of the inability of the carriers to live upon their salaries?

Mr. CANNON. Well, there is a constant reenforcement of the force. I will say to my friend, however, I am of the opinion that some small increase ought to be granted, but I will say further that $500 or $600, if that is the salary—

A Member. Five hundred dollars.

Mr. BINGHAM. The amount of the salary is fixed by the Department. The appropriation is a lump sum.

Mr. CANNON. Five hundred dollars, while it is not a great sum, is more than the average man all over the United States earns by his labor and the use of his team.

I do not make these remarks for the purpose of opposing an increase. When that question comes before the House in a proper way I shall advocate an increase.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that these carriers get $500 a year, and they furnish their own team—their own buggy or wagon, and their own horses—and they kill one horse every twelve months and are obliged to rebuy; they pay their own boarding and other expenses, and, as I know, at the end of the year, they have very little of the $500 left.

Mr. LAMB. In my district each of these carriers, as a rule, has to furnish two horses, and the allowance of $500 is altogether inadequate

Mr. CANNON, I want to call the attention of my friend from Iowa [Mr. Lacey] to this fact: There are enough rural-delivery carriers scattered through the Democratic portions of the country and the Republican portions of the country and the Populist por-tions of the country, if there are any such portions [laughter]— there are enough of them to take care of themselves, as they touch various Representatives, and there is no danger that a due increase will not be made, and there is no danger that added include will not be instant, in season and possibly out of season, to convince them that their interests are being looked after.

Mr. LACEY. But I call my friend's attention to the fact that these letter carriers have not organized.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; they have.
Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend from Iowa that it is not necessary for them to have been organized. They are scattered all over the country in the districts of every member, and that is itself a sufficient organization to bring the matter to the attention of their Representative and force action upon it by the pressure brought to bear upon members.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to interrupt the gentleman for just a moment at this point.

The Post-Office appropriation bill gave the full amount asked for and estimated for by the Department for the rural free-delivery service. I have full faith and confidence in the judg-ment of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and have no doubt that the increase in this paragraph, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, in the appropriation bill now being considered, was fully considered in his committee. But I simply desire to emphasize to the House this proposition—that when a department, after a full and thorough investigation, submits to Congress its estimate for the expenditure of that department, and Congress gives the full amount asked for, that then to come in six months afterwards and ask for an additional appropriation of $200,000 or $220,000 for that service in the way of a deficiency-although a total sum of some three and one-half million dollars was appropriated to that service—should be con-demned not only in a deficiency bill but by the Committee on Appropriations.

If the Department does not see proper to live within the limits of the appropriation made by Congress, it must be because there is an emergency that has arisen or some exceptional condition in the administration of the Department which justifies the coming before Congress again for an additional appropriation of $220,000 in the form of a deficiency.

Now, I am in perfect sympathy with the legislation covering rural free delivery; but I think the Department ought to operate within the appropriation when the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads gives all that has been estimated for or asked for by the Department.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to my colleague and friend on the committee, that two or three years ago—touching the general free-delivery service—the thing was done of which the gentleman speaks without ever calling the attention of Congress to it. The appropriation was so nearly exhausted by increases in the service in the great cities, and even in the smaller cities, that we were brought face to face with the fact that unless we appropriated for that service the free-delivery service in the cities would substantially cease on the 1st day of June.

Well, we gave the additional appropriation asked for by the Department. There was much of criticism, and undoubtedly just criticism, at that time because of the action then taken, and I wish to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that he misapprehends, I think, the situation here in the suggestion he has made. There is no deficiency in the true sense of the word. There is no necessity for any deficiency.

The Post-Office Department has frankly told us that its force of special agents and inspectors has now become practically more efficient day by day, and that between this and the 1st day of next June they will establish sufficient routes, so that if the service is put on them in February, March, April, May, and June, after it is ready to put it on, will require the whole of the appropriation. They tell us that it will cost $220,000 more than the sum already appropriated. They tell us that these routes are ready for the service. And they tell us that if, in the sense of Congress, this service, instead of being put on in February, March, and April, can be postponed to April, May, and June, then this $220,000 is not needed. That is a perfectly plain proposition, and the service will not be crippled anywhere where it now exists. That is the simple proposition with which we have to deal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have such additional time as he may desire to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The only question is whether on these new routes which have been established the service shall go into operation two or three months earlier or later.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The service is needed and wanted by the people.

Mr. CANNON. Now, your committee were of opinion that the service should be begun as early as possible, and therefore we report this deficiency.

That was the point I wanted to ask about.

Mr. CANDLER. Th Mr. CANNON. Yes

Mr. CANDLER. Unless this appropriation is made I understand that the service would be stopped at its present limit and there would be no additional routes established

Mr. CANNON. That is not quite correct. There would be some service established the 1st of February, some the 1st of March, and some in April and May; but on substantially 1,800 routes that the service has never gone on it would go two or three months earlier if we make this appropriation than it would if we do not.

Mr. CANDLER. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, we put on this bill a large amount for printing and binding—$660,000. We are constantly increasing this work. That explains this appropriation in part. We increased the salaries of employees in the Public Printing Office by legislation last year. That explains it in part. There is some slight increase—not large, possibly—in materials; but the two principal items are the increase of salaries and increase of work. As long as we order additional printing session crease of work. As long as we order additional printing, session by session of course it will require additional money. This bill by session, of course it will require additional money.

also carries all judgments of the Court of Claims-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman leaves the subject of the public printing, I wish to say that it strikes me, if the gentleman will pardon me, that this $660,000 is an enormous deficit and that if the Committee on Appropriations can mous denot and that it the Committee on Appropriations can guess halfway right they ought to guess nearer the amount necessary for an annual appropriation than that. Here is a deficiency for the balance of this fiscal year of $660,000. Now, the small amount of increase in salaries which the gentleman refers to does not account for one-tenth of this $660,000, if I remember it correctly. It seems to me that the committee in making the approximation of the seems to me that the committee in making the approximation. correctly. It seems to me that the committee in making the appropriation for public printing could guess nearer to the accurate amount than $660,000 out of the way, or two-thirds of a million dollars less than the amount called for, when the total amount appropriated, I presume, is something like $4,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. The appropriations for 1901 were $4,448,800; appropriations for 1902, deficiency and all—there was a deficiency appropriation last year of $500,000—were $4,658,000, or over $100,000 more than the regular and deficiency appropriation for 1901. Now they come with the estimate of $660,000. I ask the gentleman to listen: correctly. It seems to me that the committee in making the ap-gentleman to listen:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

Sir: I have the honor, in compliance with your request, to submit the following statement concerning the increase in the expenditures in this office, as follows:

The increase in employees is 7 per cent, the increase in wages is 7 per cent, the increase in amount of material is 15 per cent. you have it. In view of the legislation of Congress making these increases, and in view of the acts of Congress ordering additional public printing, it was just as necessary to have this increased appropriation as it is necessary for an apple to fall toward the center of the earth when it is loosed from the hand that has held it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will permit me, I will suggest that one of these items of legislation is $300,000 for leave of absence of the employees of that Public Printing Bureau.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. For what?
Mr. LIVINGSTON. For leave of absence.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no.
Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman has the amount a little too large.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is in the neighborhood of that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand that I am not assailing the integrity of the amount appropriated; but what I object to is that now, at the close of this fiscal year, he comes and asks for a deficiency for printing of $660,000, when the required amount should have been carried in the regular appropriation bill. And I even assert—I may be a little rash about it—that the Committee on Appropriations knew when they made the annual appropriation that a large deficiency would be necessary. I submit in the interest of legislation that this amount ought to be carried in a general appropriation bill. There is no other way for the Congress and the country to know what amount we are appropriating. Now, if you had put that additional sum in the appropriation bill for last year, it would have increased it nearly a million dollars, as you can see. Now they come here asking for a deficiency for a sum which should have been included in the general bill in the interest of good legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I again state to the gentleman that we appropriated in the sundry civil law, passed last March, for the service of the fiscal year, an amount equal to what the Printing Office cost the prior year and $100,000 more, giving every dollar of the estimates and meeting this service as nearly as could be calculated. The gentleman has been for years upon the Joint Committee on Printing, and this appropriation was so full and satisfactory to his vigilant mind that he did not even submit a suggestion of increase last session of Congress, and where we fell short was in not properly being able to calculate the effect of the legislation of last Congress in increasing the wages and the effect of increasing the amount of printing ordered by Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman— Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to page 47 of the bill, directly bearing on this point-and it may not be necessary to refer to it—that the law as it now exists gives to employees in the Executive Departments in Washington thirty days' vacation leave, and, in addition to that, they have thirty days' sick leave. Here is an appropriation of $60,000 to pay for the vacation of employees, and the point I desire to ask is, Does this $60,000 cover any portion of the sick leave that is now given to these employees?

Mr. CANNON. Now I will answer that question. The expense of paying leaves of absence to employees in the Government Printing Office, under the law giving them thirty days' leave of absence with full pay, is, in round numbers, $300,000 a year. Now, my friend asks whether any allowance is made for sick leave in addition. I understand not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; there is no allowance

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; there is no allowance for sick leave in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman wants to know why not put these employees on the same footing as the employees are in the other departments, if I understand him. I will answer that question by saying that I do not believe additional leave for Government employees should be allowed, and the only legislation that ought to be had is to give thirty days' leave of absence with full pay and amend the law taking away the sick leave from employees who now have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I know the gentleman has no desire to do me injustice; but last Congress I introduced a bill in hoc verba with the language of the gentleman, and I have a bill which I introduced this Congress granting thirty days' leave to Government employees, but no sick leave to employees.

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, I congratulate myself that our minds are made up on that proposition, and I am quite sure the gentleman will be so forceful in this matter that when I hold up my hands and cry "Hurrah!" he will be enabled to cooperate, with other gentlemen, in breaking up this matter of extended

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman vote for a bill giving thirty days' leave of absence to all employees of the Government, laborers as well as clerks, including sick leave?

Mr. CANNON. I will not vote to pay it at the expense of labor in private employment, which is 90, yes, 98, yes, 99 per cent of the labor of this country, and which receives one-third less than the laborer and the clerical service in the employment of the Government. I will not you to further burden that labor for further ernment. I will not vote to further burden that labor for further extension of sick leave or any other leave with pay. [Loud applause.] I will vote to cut off leave with pay to Government employees provided for by law and let them have one-third more on the average when they work for the Government than their brethren, ninety-nine out of one hundred, receive when they work for private employers and through the sweat of their faces contribute by taxation to pay all the bills.

Mr. MUDD. I only wanted to know the gentleman's position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to a provision of the bill, on page 43, establishing a bureau of insular affairs in the Attorney-General's Office

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, there is no legislation on the subject of the establishment of an insular bureau.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will just turn to the provision, the gentleman will see that it does not establish the bureau.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it provides for the employment of clerks and other officers for the conducting of such work in the Department. "For defraying the necessary expenses incurred in the conduct of insular and other Territorial matters and affairs within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice." I want to know if that does not provide for the employment of additional men in the Department of Justice that are not now provided

Mr. CANNON. I will read the rest of it: "Including the payment of the necessary employees at the seat of government or elsewhere, to be selected and their compensation fixed by the Attorney-General, and to be expended under his direction, $12,500.'

It is an appropriation made to be expended under existing law by the Attorney-General, and believed on investigation to be ab-solutely necessary to enable the Department of Justice to perform its functions under the law, and in order, the same as it is in order to increase the clerks or other employees in the various de-

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me. I am not speaking as to the necessity of this appropriation. It probably is necessary, but the gentleman has not answered my question. I desire information of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Does not this provision require and authorize the Attorney-General of the United States to employ men and fix their compensation that are not now provided for by the law of the land.

Mr. CANNON. I think not.
Mr. UNDERWOOD. These men appointed to these places will be under the civil-service provision of the law, as the general civil-service laws apply to the Department of Justice?
Mr. CANNON. I have not thought of it in that connection.

I am unable to answer the gentleman's question, because, while I can guess rudely, sometimes accurately, and frequently inaccurately as to what the statutory law provides for, infinite wisdom, I sometimes think, could only tell what is proper under the administration of the civil-service law. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that I desire information on that proposition, and the gentleman has means of obtaining that information that I have not—

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.
Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). And when the provision is reached under the five-minute rule I desire to ask him the ques-

Mr. CANNON. If I can ascertain anything further about it, I will be glad to do so. We found the appropriation of $12,500 asked for on account of the performance of these new duties, and, in the language we have used, we thought it was right and proper that the appropriation should be made, the same as it is made for other services in the Department of Justice.

other services in the Department of Justice. Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that what I contend for is this: I do not doubt for a minute that this appropriation is very proper and very necessary, but as the question came up here on the floor of the House the other day, and as the gentleman from Illinois very ably took his position on the matter in the establishment of the new Census Bureau—that we should have perfected legislation in reference to the employment and establishment of these bureaus in order that Congress and the country might know in the future what employees we had on the statute books, and who we were employing, and not leave it to the general determination of an officer of the Government to change as the shifting sands of the sea from year to year, so that we nor the country could never know where to put our finger on the men who were in the service of the Government. Now, the gentleman from Illinois took a similar position in regard to the great power of the Government. I believe from the information we get that it is necessary, but I believe that when it is necessary to establish or provide for new employees in the Government we ought to know how many are required, in what position they are going to be placed, and what is going to be done with them. I think this House and the country are now entitled to that information.

Mr. CANNON. I will state in reply to the gentleman that this is an appropriation in the opinion of the committee necessary to make precisely as the appropriation is made for Indian depredation services—some of it temporary, some of it permanent, some going to one position and some to another in the Indian Service. The provision has always been general, giving to the Department of Justice established by law the discretion. Again, it is like the appropriation made for defense of suits general in its terms, and the Department being established for this class of service necessarily requiring a little bit of discretion according to the demands of the insular service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can readily see where from time to time it would be necessary to put on one clerk and take off another. As I understand it, the bureau of insular affairs is to be organized to look after legislation in the work of the Department of Justice in reference to the new insular possessions. I imagine from what I hear that they are as likely to remain a part of this Government as any other officers we have, and if that is the case that bureau of the Department of Justice is likely to become as permanent as any other department of the Government. And if that is so, I can see no more reason why that should not be definitely fixed by law than the employment of any other persons in the Department of Justice.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to my friend that it is quite within his province, when this item is reached, to move to strike it out, or to increase it, or to reduce it. Our committee, upon inquiry of the Department of Justice, found that that Department was already answering, so far as it had the power, all questions that were referred to it or should go to the Department of Justice, including questions to the proportions to the proportion t were referred to it or should go to the Department of Justice, including questions touching our newly acquired territories. The Attorney-General said: "I am absolutely swamped for want of sufficient force to enable me to do my duty toward a growing country in connection with which these new questions are arising." And we thought it best to comply with his request and recommend to the House this small appropriation. If it does not meet the judgment of the House, I shall be quite content.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that this appropriation contemplates the employment of attorneys—men learned in the law?

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that this appropriation contemplates the employment of attorneys—men learned in the law?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And such employees of the Department are not covered by the civil-service regulations.

Mr. CANNON. I can not answer that question; I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Assistant Attorneys-General—lawyers employed by the Department of Justice—are not employed under certification by the Civil Service Commission in any case, as I understand

Mr. CANNON. I think the four Assistant Attorneys-General nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate are not so appointed. I am not sure as to the others.

Mr. MANN. I think that in no case, under the Department of Justice or elsewhere in the Government, is an attorney employed by the Government subjected to a civil-service examination.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman may be correct.
Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find in lines 19 and 20, page 2, these words:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the dip-lomatic and consular service, etc., $40,000, or so much thereof as may be nec-

Will the gentleman from Illinois inform the House what is the

Will the gentleman from Illinois inform the House what is the specific object of that appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the House all I know about it. As I understand the matter, this is what is known as the emergency appropriation, provided for, if I recollect, under section 291 of the Revised Statutes. The appropriation for this purpose for the present year was, I think, $63,000. I believe such an appropriation as this has always been made, sometimes more, sometimes less. After the best inquiry I have been able to make, I believe that fund is at this time almost exhausted, leaving only $12,000 or $13,000. Upon inquiry your committee was of the opinion that this fund should be reenforced by an appropriation of $40,000, to be placed in the hands of the President, under the of $40,000, to be placed in the hands of the President, under the provisions of section 291 of the Revised Statutes. Does my friend ant further answer?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.
Mr. CANNON. I will be entirely candid with him, as I seek to be in the committee and in the House. According to my unto be in the committee and in the House. According to my un-derstanding and information, the Emperor of Germany addressed to the President of the United States a telegram or letter direct informing him that his brother, Prince Henry, was going to visit the United States, and would be specially charged with a mes-sage of congratulation and expression of good will toward the President and people of the United States. The President, upon receiving this notice, as I understand, conceived it to be his duty, receiving this notice, as I understand, conceived it to be his duty, he being the official head of a great nation of 80,000,000 people, to properly receive and pay attention to the representative of a great nation from the other side of the water. For this, precedent has been made, if I recollect correctly, in the case of Princess Eulalie, who visited this country, I believe, in 1893, and whose expenses were paid from a fund like this, known as the emergency fund. And there are precedents in many other cases.

I believe this appropriation to be apt and proper. I think the gentleman from Mississippi, with this explanation, will acknowledge it to be apt and proper. Prince Henry as an individual, or any other individual who may visit our country, would no doubt be courteously treated by our citizens, whether he had official position or not. But when such a one comes as the representa-tive of that great people beyond the sea who have given us so many millions of their best bone and brain and brawn to help us work out the principle of self-government on this side of the Atlantic, then from every standpoint of courtesy that obtains between nations or peoples-in deference to a correct public sentitween nations or peoples—in deference to a correct public sentiment, from a standpoint of wise policy on our part toward one of the great powers of the world—from every standpoint it seemed to the President and his Secretary of State proper to ask this appropriation to enable the United States to recognize properly the great German people when they appear through their chosen representatives upon our shores in an official capacity. [Applause.] That, I believe, covers the ground.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It does. I simply wanted to know whether there was any specific purpose behind this appropriation and if so, what it was.

priation, and if so, what it was.

Mr. PRINCE. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Illinois why the word "experimental" is used in line 20, page 40, of this bill, where the language is-

For experimental rural free-delivery service.

Mr. CANNON. For the simple reason that this appropriation supplements the appropriation of the regular post-office bill providing for the service of the regular current year; and we have taken up and used the exact language of that bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have about concluded all I desired to say in connection with this subject.

Mr. GIBSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the para-Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the paragraph on page 40 in reference to fees and expenses of examining surgeons is not identical with a similar appropriation in the pen-surgeons is not identical with a similar appropriation in the pension appropriation bill which we have just passed?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; it is in the pension bill; but that, the gentleman will understand, is for the coming year, commencing on July the 1st. This is the necessary amount for the conclusion of this fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to ask the gentleman in connection with the subject he has just been discussing, who is to pay the expenses of the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, young Morgan, Captain Clark, Mr. Wetmore, and Mr. Bayless, who are, I believe, to attend the celebration of the coronation of England's new King?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, we have not arrived at that yet.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose the gentleman has given no thought to the subject at all?

Mr. CANNON. I have not studied it yet.

Mr. CANNON. I have not studied it yet.
Mr. CLARK. You have not studied it, and are not able to give the information?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well; there are so many creeks to cross that we must cross that it is not worth while to speculate six months or a year ahead in connection with these matters. the time comes it will be proper to consider them.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, with his consent.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MUDD. I wish to ask the gentleman in this connection a question with reference to the appropriation made here for the naval establishment. In many of the navy-yards of the country there has been recently a lack of funds for the purpose of carrying on necessary work, and the employees in some of them have been discharged from time to time because of this lack of funds. I would like to ask the gentleman if provision is made in this bill for the continuation of this work?

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman from Maryland that this bill fully meets the estimate of the Secretary of the Navy for the public service for the remainder of the fiscal year, for ordnance, for supplies, the yards and docks, and all the other requirements of the Navy, and I have no doubt that all necessary work will be done in expending this money, as I understand the drift of the gentleman's question, so there will be ample funds for these employees.

Mr. MUDD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not think that I am asking for the employment of any new men or an additional force merely for the purpose of providing employment.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, not at all. I understand the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. MUDD. I only want to suggest that there seems to be not sufficient money to carry on the work in some of the navy-yards. The work is necessary and important and ought to go on, and so far as I am concerned I want to see the appropriation made for its continuance without interruption.

Mr. CANNON. We have made all the appropriations asked for by the Department or estimated, in my opinion, and I think that it will also cover the matter which the gentleman unfoubtedly has in his mind, here in the navy-yard in Washington.
Mr. MUDD. The matter was called to my attention there, I am frank to say Mr. CANNON. Well, it has been called to my attention also, Mr. CANNON. Well, it has been called to my attention also, and I can only say to the gentleman that we have given all of the estimate asked by the Department. I think it is proper that we should. Men have been employed in the yard here and as the appropriations were exhausted they were dismissed. But as rapidly as possible, in an ordinary way, the necessities of the Government are being met in this regard, and I am much gratified to know that these records are being employed without regard. fied to know that these people are being employed without regard to other circumstances when they are needed in the public serv-ice, and that worthy people are employed in all the necessary functions for the accomplishment of the Government service at

Mr. McDERMOTT. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the item on page 14, providing for the payment of the superintendent of insurance a salary at the rate of $2,500 a year, and to his clerk at the rate of $1,000 a year, and a further provision of $600 for office expenditures. It is not quite clear as to what that covers.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that we included in the last Congress, and I think the last session of the last Congress in what is known as the District Code.

of the last Congress, in what is known as the District Code, a provision which provides for these people. We have written the appropriation here literally in pursuance of the law.

Mr. McDERMOTT. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations this additional question, If he does not think we are going just a little fast in these appropriations in the think we are going just a little fast in these appropriations in the District? I believe this is the best government to-day in the United states, possibly the best in the world; but I am also inclined to think it is going a little unnecessarily fast and becoming unreasonably expensive, and I desire to ask the gentleman if there is not some way of curtailing these expenditures? Is there any necessity, in the opinion of the chairman, for any such office in this system; and if so, what are the duties of the official connected with it?

Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman I will frankly state that I do not know. I suppose the necessity therefor was deter-mined when Congress enacted the legislation in what is called the mined when Congress enacted the legislation in what is called the District Code, which passed at the last session of Congress. We find the law and the people appointed under it, and this provides their pay according to law. I have no doubt my friend, the chairman of the District Committee [Mr. Babcock], or some gentleman upon that committee on that side, could answer the question much better. I am not informed as to the necessity.

Mr. McDERMOTT. The title of the office is indicative of the distinct that this officer and his clark are to perform parally to

Mr. McDERMOTT. The title of the office is indicative of the duties that this officer and his clerk are to perform, namely, to superintend some class of insurance. It is almost beyond imagination that there should be any duties attached to such an office as that that would justify these expenditures.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow an inquiry?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. My attention has been called to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to urgent deficiencies in connection with the Post-Office Department for rent of a suitable building for the storage of the files of the Post-Office for suitable building for the storage of the files of the Post-Office for the period commencing January 1 and ending June 30, 1902, $1,500.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.
Mr. BINGHAM. I have not had time to read the testimony before that committee, and I wish to ask why was that item omitted?

Mr. CANNON. Because the subcommittee, so far as I know at least I speak for myself-were of opinion that further leasat least I speak for myself—were of opinion that further leasing for that purpose ought not to be authorized until the matter was looked into more fully than we had time to look into it in that investigation; and we supposed that the subcommittee having charge of the legislative or the sundry civil bill, whichever is the appropriate bill, would look fully into it. And for the further reason that a portion of the subcommittee, at least, were of opinion that there is, if properly utilized, ample room on the eighth floor of the Post-Office building for the storage of all records that ought to be kept. And further, I am of opinion that under existing law, if the proper authority whose duty it is to examine the records for destruction would perform its functions, a very large per cent, possibly 10, maybe 20, and I should not be surprised if 25 per cent of the alleged documents in this city that cumber the files and worse than cumber the files could be destroyed

Mr. BINGHAM. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General seemed to be most insistent upon the request for this appropriation, and for that reason I have desired to get information on the

the legislative and executive bill. I am not sure whether that or the sundry civil subcommittee will have the primary jurisdic-tion; but in either event in the usual way, no doubt, that matter We did not feel that we desired to recommend will be exhausted. that appropriation at this time.

The statement of the gentleman is perfectly Mr. BINGHAM.

satisfactory to me.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg the pardon of the House for having detained it so long, and would not have done so had it not seemed necessary to occupy the floor in answering varies queries that gentlemen have made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman in charge of the bill has at length and in detail explained the pro-charge of the bill has at length and in detail explained the provisions of this bill, and while in so doing there were some pretty sharp criticisms upon the Appropriations Committee because of the size of this bill, I wish to make a few remarks on that subject. The bill does carry quite a large amount, larger than usual for an urgent deficiency bill, when it is remembered that we have a regular general deficiency bill to follow. The leader on the minority side of the House [Mr. Richardson of Tennessee] and others have sharply criticised some of the items, stating that they ought to have gone on the regular bill, but I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Appropriations is not the only committee in this House that appropriates money.

Many of these deficiencies arise on appropriations made by committee in this House that appropriates money.

Many of these deficiencies arise on appropriations made by other committees; and this is a kind of dumping ground into which all these deficiencies come, where they must be provided for. I want to say in all justice to good and decent legislation that a deficiency bill ought to have behind it one of several reasons for its appearance here. Either the departments do not estimate for money sufficient to meet proper demands or the committees having charge of appropriations do not meet those proper estimates. That is one reason why you have a deficiency on this floor. And I want to say here that some of these departments make their estimates in a very reckless way, and in such a manmake their estimates in a very reckless way, and in such a manner that no committee, with the short time allotted to that committee to make an investigation, can tell absolutely what precise amount of money ought to be appropriated.

I trust that in the future some admonition or suggestion will reach these departments that will cause them to be more careful about the amount of money they ask for specific purposes. And then I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee into whose hands the matter is placed, when a fair and legitimate estimate is made for a proper purpose, ought to meet every dollar of that estimate, and not a cent less. That is good legislation and safe legislation. The public can understand it. There is no deof that estimate, and not a cent less. That is good regislation and safe legislation. The public can understand it. There is no deception about it; there is no carrying over on account of a Presidential or other election of large amounts to be dumped into a deficiency bill to deceive the House and to deceive the people.

In the second place, the necessity for appropriations of this kind often comes from unseen causes in the management of the Government of the formula of the company of the company ernment affairs, something that nobody could possibly foresee. Some of these items arise from accidents and providential causes, such as fire and storms, which bring about some of these appropriations. There are several of them in this bill. I remember one that I thought at first in the committee room I could not support. While our buildings were being erected in Paris a storm came along and blew them all down before they were completed.

We have put an item in this bill carrying a deficiency appropriation that was made necessary by that storm. And there is another reason why we have deficiencies in this House, and that is the absolute outright disregard of law and limitations on appropriation bills. Those cases are numerous. Often an appropriating act states on its face that this is the limit. Notwithstanding that limit the departments and the bureaus go right over it and contract for larger amounts that we must meet, and they are put into these deficiency bills.

There is another trouble about this matter of appropriations, There is another trouble about this matter of appropriations, and that is the great trouble which was brought to the attention of this House about four years ago; and I think the blame would be drawn from our shoulders, as a specific committee, if you will but remember it again. There are several committees in this House that appropriate money, and they do not know what each other is doing. They are not connected with the committee that raises the revenue. The Committee on Ways and Means provides for the revenue; and then without any concept of action—for the revenue; and then without any concert of action—

Mr. BARTLETT. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question with reference to the statement he has just made, that the departments of this Government expend money in violation of law and the acts which appropriate that money? Do I understand my colleague to make that statement?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I made this statement, and I will make it over again. Notwithstanding the limitation in the appropriation act, which is the law, contracts are often entered into that go over the specific amount in that law and in that limitation.

Mr. BARTLETT. And money is paid out on that?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And you have to appropriate in this way

Mr. BARTLETT. My friend knows, as a matter of course, that it is an utter violation not only of the statute law, but of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, which declares that no moneys shall be paid out of the Treasury except on appropriations for a specific purpose?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the gentleman remembers many cases. We have discussed them on the floor of this House for the last ten years, since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, where contracts have been made exceeding by large amounts the limitation. I was speaking, Mr. Chairman, of the trouble of getting the appropriations of this House together, so that there might be harmony and consistency all along the line. It is impossible to do so when the Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Military Affairs, and other committees are authorized to report appropriation bills. If we had one committee, and that committee consisted one-half for raising revenue and the other half for making appropriations, the whole committee sitting together, having the question of raising revenue and expending it within their jurisdiction, it would be very

There is another reason, Mr. Chairman, and that brings up the question that was so lengthily discussed between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the chairman of the committee. Our insular possessions being in an unsettled and very uncertain state, appropriations can not always be made in the regular bill. It is impossible. Consequently you find the $500,000 appropriation to which reference was made; and in answer to a question—some gentleman on the floor asked why that should not be built by General Chaffee and the money taken from the treas-be built by General Chaffee and the money taken from the treasury of the Philippine Islands—I would state that he could have done it under the law, for he is supreme there, over Congress and over everybody else, and can use that fund as he pleases; but there was no fund with which to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why did not he use that fund?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I had just stated that he had power to do so, but had not the funds. We are to-day and the civil commission there in power are trying to establish schools. It has taken an enormous amount of money to do it. More than that, they are trying to set up municipal governments in all the cities, towns, and villages, establishing a police force; that requires an are trying to set up municipal governments in all the cities, towns, and villages, establishing a police force; that requires an enormous amount of money; and all those things, the establishing of courts, civil courts, with jury and witness expenses, and all those things bring an enormous expense upon the revenues of the Philippine Islands, and if this amount, $500,000, in this bill should come from the revenues of the Philippine Islands, either the schooling of the children, or the courts, or the policing and the municipal expenses in the villages and cities would have to go unprovided for. That is the reason why it was put in this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will my friend allow me, in view of the fact that he has referred to me and what I said in answer to the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman is justifying, as I understand it, the appropriation of $500,000 for the fying, as I understand it, the appropriation of $500,000 for the Army post at Manila.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am not justifying it, but giving the reason why it went in here.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Did the gentleman consent in the committee that it should go in?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Georgia certainly did consent that it should go in or it would not have been in without

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The point I want to get at is this: The gentleman from Illinois failed to point out any law authorizing it. Now, will the gentleman from Georgia tell us where there is any law or authorization of this appropriation?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not think that there is any specific

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Inasmuch as the law is explicit that no appropriation shall go into any general appropriation bill except in accordance with the law, how does the gentleman from Georgia justify himself in consenting to this provision?

man from Georgia justify himself in consenting to this provision? That is the question I wanted the gentleman from Illinois to answer, and now will the gentleman from Georgia do it?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee will remember the act gives certain powers to the War Department and to the President to carry on the expense of the war, or whatever you may call it, in the Philippine Islands, and authorizes them to do anything and everything for the preservation of life and property, not only for the Filipino, but for the soldiers and the property of the United States Government there involved. It was thought by the committee—or some members of it, at least—and by myself that perhaps that law authorized this appropriation.

Now, I am going to tell the gentleman why it was made. The conduct of the soldiers and citizens in the city of Manila has demonstrated the fact that they must be separated. Some of the reasons can be made public and some can not on the floor of this The moral care and preservation of our troops absolutely demand that they should be separated.

Again, it is said, and we were so informed, that in nearly every instance where there was trouble between the citizen and the soldier, or where there was a rebellion against the flag, it was brought about by some imprudent conduct on the part of an offi-cer or a soldier. Recently a large lot of cavalry has been shipped to the Philippine Islands. They must have shelter for their horses, and it was proven in the committee, and thoroughly set up as a matter of fact, that this $500,000 expended for shelter would be no more costly and no more expensive than if the whole thing had been done with duck or canvas shipped from this country.

It is to shelter our soldiers from the wet season which will soon come, to shelter the horses, to separate the troops from these citizens, take them out of the huts and alleys and lanes of the cities and put them where discipline can be had. These are the reasons for it. Whether it ought to be in this bill or somewhere else is a legal question, and, not being a lawyer, I am going to leave that to the gentleman from Tennessee and the chairman of the committee to fight over under the five-minute rule when it comes before the House. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the point I tried Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the point I tried to make has not been very clearly grasped by the gentlemen who have discussed this measure, or else I do not grasp it myself. On page 17 of the bill I find this language: "For the establishment in the vicinity of Manila, in the Philippine Islands, of a military post," etc.

The point I make is that the Appropriations Committee has no right to expressions for anything not provided for by existing

The point I make is that the Appropriations Committee has no right to appropriate for anything not provided for by existing law, and by this act they are establishing a military post in the Philippine Islands. The Philippine Islands belong to the United States, and I concede that they have as much right to establish a post there as they would have in any part of the United States, but they certainly have no greater right to establish it there than they would have to establish it in any other Territory or State.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] in the discussion said we acquired it by treaty right. By treaty right we did not give the Committee on Appropriations any larger jurisdiction than it had before we made the treaty. We acquired certain posts from Spain. These posts were established by the law of Spain, and a deficiency for their support would be in order from the Committee on Appropriations; but the point I make is a deficiency can not exist where the object of the appropriation has not been provided for by any law whatever.

The gentleman speaks about the right acquired by treaty. We

The gentleman speaks about the right acquired by treaty. We acquired Louisiana by treaty; we paid for it; it became our territory, and yet the Congress of the United States reserved the right at all times to say what improvements should be started, what posts laid out, what laws established in the ordinary way, by the regular committees of this House. It think the army in what posts laid out, what laws established in the ordinary way, by the regular committees of this House. I think the army in the Philippines needs this appropriation. I did not want to make the point of order, but I did want before this House, and before the Committee on Appropriations, to preserve the rights of the Military Committee to continue the legislation given it by the rules of the House.

I have no doubt that this appropriation is needed more urgently now from the fact that the civil government in Manila and other places in the Philippine Islands have been largely taking all the public buildings heretofore used by the army for civil offices. I have no doubt they need it from the fact that the health of the troops will be better in a new post established outside of the city of Manila than in the old posts used by the Spanish Government. I have no doubt of that fact; but I think that if the War ment. I have no doubt of that fact; but I think that if the War Department or the Treasury Department and the Speaker of the House had referred this question to the Committee on Military Affairs, where it properly belongs, they could have had a bill reported and adopted by the Congress of the United States as expeditiously as could the Committee on Appropriations.

I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations

I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that our army in Manila must be cared for, must be properly housed and clothed and fed. That is all true. But my friend will agree with me that the Committee on Appropriations has no right to undertake to establish new posts in the United States—has no right, under the rules of the House, to undertake to establish by law a Soldiers' Home; has no right to establish by law a national park; no right to establish by law any new improvement that the Congress of the United States has not already passed upon. And if the Committee on Appropriations can not do that with reference to any point in the old States and Territories, it can not do it with reference to Manila. But on account of the emergency of this public improvement I wanted to make this statement to the House now, without raising a point of order under the fivethe House now, without raising a point of order under the five-minute rule and having the item ruled out of the bill, delaying further the building of this new post.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman answer a question:

Mr. HULL. I will if I can.
Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman with much interest, and I would like to know how it is that the rules of this House can apply to the House when legislating for the Philippine Islands while the Constitution does not apply to this House when so legislating.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a question which is not pertinent to this discussion, and I have no reply to make to it.

Allow me to say as to one illustration of my friend from Illipids that when it was decided to should be not at the Constitution of Illipids.

nois, that when it was decided to abandon the post at Omaha and start the post at Fort Douglas, some miles from Omaha, the Congress of the United States authorized the establishment of the new post. When the General of the Army wanted a post at Helena, Mont., application was made to the Military Committee, and the post was established. So with all these other posts that have been established.

I am not antagonizing this appropriation now, because, as I said a while ago, it is important that the post should be built—absolutely important. I have no doubt on earth that the Committee on Military Affairs would promptly have reported a bill if the question had been referred to that committee. But I do want to preserve the line which my good friends will acknowledge it is sometimes very difficult to preserve between the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations and that of the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to Army appropriations. For instance, the Appropriations Committee has under its control the fortification with that hill it has the Appropriations Committee has under its control the fortification appropriation bill; and in connection with that bill it has gradually taken from the Committee on Military Affairs the right to provide for the equipment of the artillery, which the rules say shall belong to the Committee on Military Affairs, because the artillery arm is as much a part of the line of the Army as is the infantry or cavalry; and everything affecting the line of the Army should undoubtedly go to the Military Committee.

The establishment of military posts goes to the Committee on Military Affairs not on account of that division of jurisdiction, but because under the rules the Committee on Appropriations but because under the rules the Committee on Appropriations but because under the rules the Committee on Appropriations has no right to initiate new legislation. The Committee on Miltary Affairs can not, under the rules of this House, enact such legislation as this on the Army appropriation bill without unanimous consent of the members. The General of the Army or Secretary of War have no right to establish posts; they may and do provide temporary barracks and quarters. They have in the past established some posts this way which Congress has permitted, by appropriating for from year to year, to become practically permanent; but the power to do this legally is in Congress, and Con-We should not abdicate our right in such matters.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Wadsworth having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Pruden, one of his secretaries.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PIERCE obtained the floor and said: I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, if it is true, as the gentleman from Georgia said, that General Chaffee is supreme in the Philippine Islands, that he is supreme over Congress and the rest of us, then the sooner General Chaffee is brought down a few pegs and ordered back to this country the better we shall be off; for it is one of the well-established tenets of the Democratic party, that the military authority must be subordinate to the civil authority. That tary authority must be subordinate to the civil authority. That principle lies at the very root of republican institutions.

My friend the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. Cannon] makes sporadic fights in this House, as the doctors would say, for economy in expenditure, in which I have generally sympathized with and aided him; but he has been very tender footed and squeenish to day short appropriate questions. I asked sympathized with and aided him; but he has been very tender footed and squeamish to-day about answering questions. I asked a perfectly fair question, Who is going to pay the expenses of this extraordinary aggregation of talent, made up of Hon. Whitelaw Reid, General Wilson, Captain Clark, young Mr. Pierpont Morgan, young Mr. Bailess, and young Mr. Wetmore, to attend the coronation of His Sacred Majesty King Edward the Seventh? The gentleman from Illinois answered that he did not know. He had not thought about that. He had better be turning his luminous intellect upon that subject. intellect upon that subject.

Now, I have a suggestion to make to him. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways, and if it is right and proper for us to pay the expenses of Prince Henry of Hohenzollern in making us a visit, it is eminently proper for King Edward VII to pay the expenses of Reid, Morgan, Clark, and the rest of those people who are going over there to see him crowned. I am teetotally opposed to paying a cent on that score. It is all right to pay the expenses of entertaining Prince Henry. I am glad he is coming, because his visit and the welcome the American people and Government will give him will have a tendency to give the lie to the slander that certain Anglomaniacs of this country are trying to work up, to the effect that the American people are friendly to England and an enemy to Germany, which is not true.

It is all right to pay the expenses of Prince Henry. He is our guest and we will make him have a good time.

But if the chairman of the Appropriations Committee does not know who will pay the expenses of Hon. Whitelaw Reid & Co., I do, and will give him the information. Some time, in some way, American people will be compelled by a Republican Congress and a Republican Administration to pay the bills. So far as I am concerned, I will never vote one cent to pay any man's expenses to go to England, or elsewhere, to help crown a king. We went out go to England, or elsewhere, to help crown a king. We went out of the coronation business July 4, 1776, and we are not yet ready to return to that unnatural and un-American habit.

Now, I want to say a word about this appropriation of $500,000 for barracks at Manila. On the first day of this Congress, or the second, I forget which, the minority made what fight it could to keep the Reed rules from being adopted in this House. We wanted a chance to amend them and discuss them and make them better and more modern. But the Republican majority rammed those rules down our throats whether we wanted them or not. One of those rules provides that you can not adopt new legislation on an appropriation bill. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] has not the boldness to raise a point of order when that item comes up under the five-minute rule, I will do so myself, al-item comes up under the five-minute rule, I will do so myself, although I do not profess to be a parliamentary sharp.

As to the merits of that item: We captured Manila—and it was a partnership capture at best—in 1898. We needed barracks over there as much in 1898 as we do now; we needed barracks as much in 1899 as we do now; we needed barracks as much in 1900 as we do now. There has been ample opportunity to bring in a bill here for the construction of barracks at Manila and to give this House a chance to pass upon this question in the regular, sober, serious, careful way in which legislation ought to be adopted. There is no sense in violating a wholesome rule of the House by rushing this new legislation through under the whip and spur of an urgency deficiency bill. This $500,000 item is only a starter. We had better kill the scheme now.

The most melancholy declaration I have ever heard made on the floor of this House was made by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] when he said that we were to hold the Illinois [Mr. Cannon] when he said that we were to hold the Philippine Islands forever and a day—the most idiotic scheme that was ever hatched in the mind of man. Up to this present day the holding of the Philippine Islands has cost the American people about $300,000,000, and it is costing them $12,000,000 a month now. The Secretary of War asks for as much money this year as he did last. Does not he? The Secretary of the Navy asks this House for twenty millions more than he did last year, and yet my friend from Illinois says we intend to keep that process up. That is what he meant. He did not use those words, but what he did say indicates that we are to keep up this process of what he did say indicates that we are to keep up this process of spending $12,000,000 a month forever and a day.

Somebody on that side talked about civil government in the Philippines. On the 4th day of last July, with a great flourish of trumpets, they did establish civil government in those islands, and according to my information now every one of them has fallen to the ground except the one in the island of Luzon, and 5,000 insurgents are roaming around on that island almost in gunshot of Manila, where we started in 1898.

shot of Manila, where we started in 1898.

How much can we get out of it? Why, I remember a long time ago in this House that somebody asked my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor] how long he intended to hold these islands. He replied that "we intended to hold them until we could squeeze all the money out of them we could get." That was just exactly the same plan that my illustrious fellow-citizen, Jesse James, used about holding up a railroad train [laughter], "until he could squeeze all the money out of it he could," and he kept up that business until a Democratic governor laid him away in his grave.

When did they begin taxing the people of the United States to build barracks out there? Why, until last April all these things were done out of the revenues of the Philippine Islands, and it is only since then that they have undertaken it. Why, my friend from Illinois says, it takes so much money to build the school-houses and educate the Filipinos that they thought it better to take this little item of $500,000 to build barracks over there out of the United States Transfer the United States Treasury.

Once more the doctrine that charity begins at home applies.

Within the broad confines of this Republic—north, south, east, and west—millions of American children, white and black, are without the school facilities that they ought to have, and here we are boasting and vaunting ourselves upon going away from home, where the intelligence and education would do us some good, and squandering money in the Philippine Islands, 7,000 miles away, to educate somebody we never saw, never expect to see, and, so far as I am concerned, never want to see. [Laughter.] Let us educate American children first and after that go out as educational missionaries.

ECONOMY IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

For a long time I have been looking for "the man who would rather work than eat." I have never found that abnormal and interesting character for the all-sufficient reason that he does not exist. He is a mere figment of the imagination. He is a myth, as much as Jupiter or Minerva, Hercules or Venus, Vulcan or Aphrodite, Cyclops, or the sirens with their dulcet songs.

I have long since abandoned my chase after him, and lately have been diligently searching for the man who really enjoys paying taxes—enjoys it as he enjoys going to the circus and other such hilarious performances. I have not found him. He has neither a local habitation nor a name. He is as fleeting as the mirage of the desert, a will o' the wisp, or an ignis fatuus. He does not exist. If he did, he would be a monstrosity in the animal kingdom.

If we lived up to the Golden Rule we would have little need for Presidents and Congresses, governors and legislatures, courts and sheriffs, court-houses, penitentiaries, and jails, armies and navies, and all the other costly adjuncts of modern civilization, but because we do not observe the Golden Rule we have all these things galore. To support them, the taxgatherer, like the poor, we always have with us, and we most probably will have him until the dawn of the millennium.

All sensible people recognize taxes as a necessary evil—the less of which we have the better.

Therefore it should be the constant aim of legislators, national, State, or municipal, to secure the maximum of good government with the minimum of taxation.

To recklessly squander the people's money, as has been done here for years, is to invite and deserve the condemnation denounced upon those who grind the faces of the poor.

In his first inaugural—which has become a classic—Thomas Jefferson laid down certain basic principles which should guide those charged with the conduct of the Federal Government.

Inter alia he declared for "economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened."

Nothing could blind his clear vision to the fact that every dollar means a day of toil and sweat by somebody somewhere, and that in the last analysis labor pays all the taxes and foots all the bills of government.

How far we have departed in practice from his theory is shown by the riotous totals of the appropriations in the last ten years. It is easy to be generous, even prodigal, with other people's

When the Fifty-first Congress was first dubbed "A billion-dol-lar Congress," it is reported that Hon. Thomas Brackett Reed answered the taunt with the bravado that "this is a billion-dollar country." If that brilliant man ever considered the acts of the Fifty-sixth Congress he must be compelled to remodel his famous mot so as to read, "this is a billion and a half dollar country," in order to make it harmonize with the appropriations of that Congress. Indeed, he would not have needed to wait till the Fifty-sixth Congress to revise his caustic remark, for the enlarged version of his mot would have applied to the Fifty-fifth Congress, the last over which he presided, whose appropriations were wicked and wanton waste.

The only circumstance which could be urged in mitigation of the colossal appropriations of the Fifty-fifth Congress when compared with those of the Fifty-sixth is that we were then engaged in a foreign war, while during the life of the Fifty-sixth Congress we were said to be at peace with all the world.

we were said to be at peace with all the world.

Still the totals are astounding year by year, and the voice of the reformer is silenced, while extravagance runs riot.

The growth of per capita Federal expenditures is amazing. In 1803, the second year of Jefferson's Administration, the per capita Federal expenditures were only 50 cents.

In 1803, and or to hear the results of the second of the second year.

În 1842, under John Tyler, they had risen to $1.39. In 1860, when James Buchanan was President, they had grown to $2.01.

During the civil war the totals of appropriations, as well as the per capita expenditures, took an immense jump.

The lowest per capita appropriation since the war was in 1886, during Cleveland's first term, when it was $4.22, the total being $242,483,138.

In 1891 the per capita expense was $5.71; in 1896, $4.93; in 1897, $5.01; last year was almost $10 per capita, and unfortunately the tendency is toward still greater expenditures.

No living man can assign any valid or convincing reason for this astounding and rapid growth in the per capita public expenditures. Certainly no member of this House has cheek enough to assert that the Government as now administration improve-ment upon Jefferson's method of administration.

Liberality in pensions to our soldiers and sailors and their widows, orphans, and dependent parents has become the settled policy ows, orphans, and dependent parents has become the settled policy of the Government; but few have avowed themselves openly in favor of a civil pension list, and yet that system, and of colossal proportions at that, is in sight. It is at present a cloud no larger than a man's hand, but unless Congress takes an immediate and resolute stand against it in a few years it will envelop the entire

The retired list is growing like Jonah's gourd vine. It is a great pity that it will not wither as soon. It is now proposed to pension ex-Presidents.

To place a person on the retired list with a salary is only another way of granting a pension.

The bill pending, to raise the salary of the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service and then retire them on three-fourths pay, will cost the people about $200,000 a year. There is no shadow of excuse for that raid on the Treasury. What is still worse, it is only the forerunner of a vast brood of similar bills to retire somebody and forerunner of a vast brood of similar bills to retire somebody and finally to retire everybody—that is everybody holding an appointive place under the Government—at a good, fat salary. The employees of the Weather Bureau and the railway mail clerks will come next; and, truth to tell, they are just as much entitled to a pension as are the revenue-cutter officers. Then the vast army—constantly growing vaster—of clerks, agents, and supernumeraries in all the departments and in the service of the Government anywhere and proven here and the province of the covernment anywhere and proven here. where and everywhere will be pensioned. If I voted to retire the officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service I would vote to pension all

The inevitable result is that none of the taxpayers will be granted pensions and all of the taxeaters will enjoy that luxury.

There would be more wisdom and more justice is establishing a universal old-age pension for every citizen of the Republic than there are in the manner in which we are proceeding to create an old-age pension list from the civil departments of the Government.

The average citizen who is not in the employment of the Government is just as worthy of an old-age pension as is the Government employee, for the latter receives the higher compensation while the former does more and harder work.

Yet there is a constant, and apparently irresistible, pressure to increase the salaries of all governmental appointees, notwithstanding the fact that there are scores of applicants for every place at the present salaries—sometimes hundreds of applicants and notwithstanding the further fact that if the Angel of Death should spread his wings on the blast to-night and kill every employee of the Government as dead as he killed the army of Sennacherib in a week's time every place could be filled by somebody as competent as the present incumbent.

At the last session of Congress Mr. HEMENWAY, of Indiana, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, made the startling declaration on the floor of the House that at least 10 per cent of all the department clerks are incapacitated for any duty by reason of old age or other infirmity, but they draw their salaries as regularly as the most robust one in the lot. Of course the per cent will grow year by year, for it is no fiction that life tenure in office fosters longevity. Any system which breeds such a state of affairs is an outrage on the toilers of the land, an insult to our boasted intelligence, a nuisance which should be abated for the public

In this connection I wish to state clearly and emphatically that have nothing whatever against the persons who are the beneficiaries of the public bounty by reason of increased salaries, or of being retired on full or three-fourths pay, or of drawing pay for which they are unable to render any service. They are, almost without exception, amiable and intelligent citizens, and it is largely because they are amiable and intelligent that Congress is largely because they are amiable and intelligent that Congress yields to their unjust and unreasonable demands. Another reason that Congress yields, reluctantly and against its better judgment, as I believe, is that the applicants for this largess are here on the ground, in a city 60 per cent of whose residents claim citizenship elsewhere and a much larger per cent of whom live directly or indirectly on salaries paid by the Government. There is a community of interest among them; they seek two ends in common—increase of pay and life tenure in position—and they generally get what they go after.

I have never had any ambition to be proclaimed as "A watchdog of the Treasury." I have not arrogated to myself the character of an economist. I have not posed as an objector. It is an ungracious and ungraceful performance to object to the pet bills and provisions of other members and well calculated to render a man unpopular with his fellow-Representatives; but there are waste and extravagance everywhere.

If John D. Rockefeller, who is generally taken and accepted as the richest man in America, were to conduct his business as recklessly as the Government's business is run he would go into bankruptcy in less than ten years.

There is not a man living who has brains, intelligence, and ingenuity enough to defend the methods pursued by Congress at present and for years past.

I have no doubt whatever that a good business man can run the Government business as well as it is now run for one-half of what we expend for that purpose.

It is our solemn duty to readopt "Economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened."

Here is a table showing aggregates of expenditures for every fiscal year since 1855:

I remember an old adage which says "Give the devil his due." I remember an old adage which says "Give the devil his due," and although I would not compare my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to his satanic majesty [laughter], still it is due to the gentleman to state that I will give the devil his due while endeavoring on this floor to procure economy in public expenditures. I have seen these expenses grow in amount from year to year, in the appropriation bills, and neither the one party nor the other is entirely to blame for it. It is a condition of affairs which has grown upon us gradually. That is the exact truth. I have seen the honorable gentleman from Illinois make the most gallant efforts to economize the expenditures in this House, and in nearly every case he was outweighted and borne down. I saw the gentleman in that position often during the last Congress. the last Congress.

There is another thing. I have observed here ever since I have been in the House, that there is no trouble whatever to establish been in the House, that there is no trouble whatever to establish a new office. There is no trouble whatever to raise the salary of an old official; but the very minute you undertake to abolish an old office or to cut down an old salary you run up against some insuperable obstacle. And let me tell you, my fellow-members, there is an old saying that charity should begin at home, and so should economy begin at home. There are twice as many employees hanging around this very House as there is any necessity for. There are so many of them that you almost have to run over them to get in and out. You have up in this gallery here two able-bodied citizens sitting at every one of these doors to pull the door open; and as a member suggested to me the other day, a the door open; and as a member suggested to me the other day, a gentleman of humorous turn of mind, when my brother from St. gentleman of numorous turn of mind, when my brother from St.
Louis [Mr. Joy] was trying to get two more on the pay roll, that the proper thing to do was to make an appropriation for some kind of machinery to lift these doorkeepers up gently so they would not overtax themselves in getting up to open the doors. [Laughter.]
Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me there?
Mr. CLARK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I think myself there are some unnecessary officials in the House and Senate, especially in the Senate; but if the public prints can be relied upon as anywhere nearly correct, it seems to me that the Missouri legislature double discounts the House of Representatives of the United States in its employees, and as that is at home, and charity and economy begin there, would my friend from Missouri be curious to run a comparison between the two? [Laughter and applause on the Republican

Mr. CLARK. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is exceedingly amusing. It marks my friend from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] as a humorist fit to rank with Grover Cleveland in his fishing articles. [Laughter.] But it is decidedly uncandid. I am not a member of the Missouri legislature. When I was, thirteen years ago, they did not have half as many clerks there as they have had since that time. Recently they have reduced the number very much. But I am here to legislate for the people of the United States, and I will give you my opinion in a nut shell, that unless these riotous totals of appropriations are cut down this great official system will get so top-heavy that it will topple to the ground of its own

I am not stingy in the public service. I have no disposition to set up as a cheeseparing statesman. I am willing to pay public officials and to pay them well, but I am not in favor of having twice as many people on the pay roll as employees as there ought

Now, the gentlemen over there on the other side had a confab among themselves about raising the wages of these rural free mail carriers. I have no doubt on earth they will be raised. mail carriers. I have no doubt on earth they will be raised. They are getting more now than the average citizen can get. The people over in the departments are getting more pay and do less work than the average citizen. Yet they will all get their wages raised. And I undertake to say now that if every Federal official, including the House of Representatives and Senate, were to die to-night, within a month a new set could be secured who would discharge the official duties just as well as those who hold the offices now. What is more, they would take the offices gladly the offices now. What is more, they would take the offices gladly at the old salaries. I do not know of anybody in my district who is refusing to come to Congress because the pay is not big enough. The truth is that we have become so thoroughly used to talking about millions and hundreds of millions here in this House that whenever we are discussing public measures every one of us has come to feel as though we were all multi-millionaires or billionaires ourselves. There will be a day of reckoning. Of course, as long as times are flush I understand perfectly well that it will be difficult to induce the American people to scrutinize appropriadifficult to induce the American people to scrutinize appropria-tion bills closely. That is the reason extravagance is rampant. But whenever it becomes a little hard to pay the taxes they will begin to scrutinize them, and we ought to begin now to economize in all these unnecessary things against that day which must

I suggest to every man here, it is not a matter of politics, it is a matter of economy, it is a matter of plain common sense; and every dollar that we expend here in excess of what we ought to every dollar that we expend here in excess of what we ought to spend is practically a robbery of the people. I hear statesmen here talking about the money which belongs to the United States Government. It does not own a single dollar of money anywhere on the face of the earth. It is simply a trustee for the people, and a trustee of an express trust. Cato used to wind up every speech that he made in the Roman senate, no difference what the subject was, with, "Delenda Carthago est!" Carthage must be destroyed! It would be a good thing if every member in this destroyed! It would be a good thing if every member in this House would get into the habit of winding up every speech that he makes, no matter what the theme, with this declaration, that "Federal expenditure must be kept within the limits of government of the people, by the people, and for the people, economically administered." [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Hill having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3239. An act providing for the free transportation of all mail matter sent by Mrs. Ida S. McKinley.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER protempore announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 2044. An act to increase the amount of the official bond to be furnished by the United States marshal for the district of Alaska in certain cases; and

S. R. 15. Joint resolution to pay the expenses of the United States Government exhibit at the South Carolina Interstate and West Indian Exposition, in the city of Charleston, county of Charleston, State of South Carolina, during the years 1901 and

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes, or so much time as he may desire, to the gentleman from Illinois.
Mr. CANNON. I only want a very brief time. I have listened with much interest to the gentleman from Missouri. It seems to me I have heard much of what he said, in substance, before, and yet if it be a good thing it can not be said too often. I am glad that the gentleman is so much of an economist. I should be very glad, indeed, of his careful assistance, as every other member of the House would be, in watching legislation, the enactment of new legislation, the entering upon new policies, for the cutting down of appropriations where they ought to be cut down, running all along through the details. I know if the gentleman gives his careful attention to the matter that he will be efficient. I know he will be on foot many times in the future where he has not been either on foot or horseback heretofore when the matter of appropriations was being considered.

I always listen to the gentleman with a great deal of interest. I always listen to the gentleman with a great deal of interest. Thomas Jefferson; a hundred years ago; expenditures only 50 cents a head; 5,000,000 people then, I believe; according to the gentleman's statement, the expenditures only two millions and a half! If the gentleman would look it up again, I think he would find he is somewhat in error. He says now it is $12 a head. Oh! no, no; nowhere near $12 a head for the expenditures in this country, notwithstanding the great change. I was interested somewhat in this statement: According to the gentleman, there was $2.500,000 in expenditures in 1802 under Jefferson. I do not recol-$2,500,000 in expenditures in 1802 under Jefferson. Ido not recollect that the gentleman's voice was raised in opposition when, under the new conditions, this House solemnly pledged itself to give $5,000,000 for the St. Louis Exposition to celebrate the acquisition of the territory acquired under Jefferson—twice as much as the whole Government cost, according to the gentleman, in 1802, under Jefferson. [Laughter.] Oh, where was the eloquent voice of the gentleman from Missouri then? [Laughter.]

The great city of St. Louis, one of the many great cities, splendid and magnificent in the year 1902, in the State of Missouri, and by its permission, I believe, gives $15,000,000 toward one little show down there [laughter], making, with what the United States gives, $20,000,000 in all. My countrymen, what extravagance!

Great laughter.

Does the gentleman from Missouri refer to the expenditures made prior to 1860 as any guide for the expenditures that are to be made now? If he does not, what was the object of his speech? A new order of things has come in. The expenditures already made (and I crave the gentleman's attention) since the 4th day of March, 1861, that this nation might be preserved, in the payment of the receiver and experience the Army and News greaters. of the pensions and sustaining the Army and Navy growing out of that great war, amounts to more than $9,000,000,000. Why, for pensions alone to the soldiers of the late war $140,000,000 a year are appropriated, and the gentleman strikes an attitude and talks about how much per capita it cost under Jefferson's Administration in 1802. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not pose as the watchdog of the Treasury. I am not a cheeseparing statesman. I have no desire to play in that rôle. I am for raising every dollar of money by taxation, and expending I am for raising every dollar of money by taxation, and expending every dollar of that money that it is necessary to expend to enable the United States of America to perform its function with efficiency everywhere in our borders, including the newly acquired territory, upon all the oceans and seas of the earth and everywhere the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.] I where about the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not want to spend one dollar more. As the chairman of the great committee that prepares for the consideration of the House many of these great annual bills, my best efforts are given to that end. The gentleman says my desire to keep the Philippine Is-lands forever and a day is idiotic. Well, that is merely a matter lands forever and a day is idiotic. Wen, that is done. The Philippine Islands have been acquired by the United States by the highest law. I used to tell a story in the last campaign which saved me a half hour's talk inside of a minute, and I will tell it now. John and Mary, son and daughter of two farmers down in central Illinois, married. They were good people and lived upon a little farm of 80 acres of land. They agreed among themselves, among other things, that they did not want twins. They wanted a son. In the fulness of time a son was born. There was great rejoicing upon the part of the husband. Presently he was informed that there was another son; that was two. He tore his hair and rushed in and said, "Wife, we don't want twins." She said, "Husband, we have got them." [Great laughter.] And the love of that good woman twined about them, and in the fulness of time and vigorous manhood they will become citizens of a great Republic.

We have got the Philippines. Now, the gentleman from Missouri had quite as much to do with the beginning of the war under which the Philippines came as I had. I accept the logical sequence. He rejects it. Sometimes gentlemen, like my friend, I have thought, were always for war and its consequences in time of peace and for peace in time of war. That is to say, these things result, I will say to my friend, from the war with Spain. Nothing will undo them. I do not believe, if my friend was chargeable with the power to do it, if he was the President, or speaking for the majority in this House of Representatives, if he was in a position where he was required to act—because I have great respect for him, his courage, his capacity, and for his patriotism—I do not believe if he could stand up and by his single voice dispose of the Philippines or get away from the obligations of that treaty, the highest law of the Republic, that he would dispose of them or part with a single acre or island. I am kinder to my friend than he is to himself.

Another gentleman a few minutes ago asked the gentleman from Another gentleman a few minutes ago asked the gentleman from Ohio this question: "How can we, under the rules of this House, effect legislation touching the Philippines when the Constitution, which is the permanent law and the highest law, does not go there?" I am glad to answer my friend. No man anywhere, here or elsewhere, for that matter, has greater regard for that fixed law of the land, the Constitution of the United States, than I have; and it goes everywhere that the flag goes. In the Philippines, with a people who are not competent for self-government; with a people in insurrection, with a people who are being educated and in the fullness of time will be fully educated and through the generations gradually work up to a capacity for self-government, the erations gradually work up to a capacity for self-government, the same usages and customs and revenue laws that exist in the United States, as we have built them up for over three hundred years, would not apply in every instance.

Therefore the Constitution of the United States, like the grace of God, is big enough and strong enough to throw its arms about the Philippines and adapt itself from year to year and generation the Finishes and adapt tests from year to year and generation to generation to their condition. That is what the Constitution of the United States can do; and it does go there. Gentlemen say it does not; I say it does go there; and that your Government and mine—a government of the people—can do as much anywhere that it may be possessed of territory as any monarchy or any other convergence to the earth has the power to do the difference because. government on the earth has the power to do, the difference be-tween the two being that we do things right, from the standpoint of self-government and building peoples up to self-government, while they frequently do things which, according to our standpoint, are not right.

I did not intend to submit additional remarks in this general debate, but I felt that I wanted to say what I have said. I am glad that I live in the year 1902. I am glad that this country has grown in population within our borders without regard to the newly acquired territory to almost 80,000,000 people. I am glad that we have 200,000 miles of railways. I am glad that we have the greatest internal trade in the United States amongst ourselves—if we did not have one dollar of trade abroad—of any government on earth. I am glad that we are first in agriculture among the nations of the earth. I am glad that we are first in manufactures among the nations of the earth. I am glad that our commerce for the surplus, which is insignificant in comparison with the home consumption, grows by leaps of a hundred millions or more every year. I am glad that we are broad enough to reach out and be upon terms of courtesy—international courtesy with the world.

When Prince Henry reaches our shores and is entertained by our people, I am glad, that coming as he does, in an official capaour people, I am glad, that coming as he does, in an official capacity, he is to be entertained at the expense of all the people; [applause] and when our people go from the United States to Great Britain (if they do go—I have paid no attention to that—the matter has not come to me), when our people go to the mother country, having the same laws, the same language, the same literature, the same civilization as ourselves—if they go upon the invitation of Great Britain or if they go officially to represent our people, I expect, that when they strike Great Britain's borders, they will be entertained by Great Britain as we shall entertain Prince Henry. But from the United States to Great Britain's borders, if we send them. I will vote to pay their expenses as borders, if we send them, I will vote to pay their expenses, as Prince Henry's expenses will be paid en route, no doubt, to our borders. The two cases would be upon all fours.

I glory in speaking the English language. I glory in the Anglo-Saxon, the English, the American literature. I glory in our for-eign trade. But I can not forget that one-half of our great foreign trade is done with our brethren under the flag of Great Britain, who speak the same language that we do.

I am for German policy. I am for French policy. I am for correct policy of all the governments of this earth as long as it is correct, and I am for Great Britain's policy as long as it is corcorrect, and I am for Great Britain's policy as long as it is correct. When she is right, when she is our best customer, I am for treating her as such—for meeting her halfway and standing with her as we stand with other nations and with other civilizations. And thank God, when she is wrong, we are strong enough and great enough to say, "Thus far and no farther shalt thou come." Loud applause.]

I beg the pardon of the House for having in this general debate strayed away from this deficiency bill. It seemed to me that something like what I have said was apt in reply to the gentleman who has last spoken and others touching the question of general policy.

Mr. PIERCE. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from

Mr. PIERCE. 1 yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I am prompted now to ask a little of the time of the House; prompted by the appearance of a new friend of the Constitution—an unexpected appearance—an unheralded appearance—a remarkable appearance. I refer, of course, to the appearance in this guise and garb of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon]. This is an event of some importance. There had not been any suspicion abroad in the land, and certainly none in the House, that the gentleman was going to declare any remarkable friendship for the Constitution, for up to this date, so far as we have been able to observe, he has not evinced any.

He is, however, a friend of the Constitution, because we have his own statement as evidence of the fact. He glories, as we all do, in the greatness of our country; but he assigns somewhat dif-ferent reasons for his glorification from those which affect some of us. He tells us that the Constitution follows the flag, and he tells us almost in the same breath that while the Constitution is in the Philippines and everywhere that our flag is seen we, in the Philippines and elsewhere, have the power and right to do every-thing that any other nation has the power and right to do; and then he draws the remarkably fine and neat distinction that we differ from other nations in that we do, and seek to do, only that which is right, while they in their perversity do that which is wrong.

The Constitution of the United States, which we are assured by the gentleman from Illinois, has gone to the Philippines, as well as remains here in the United States, fixes a limit to what we can do, as that instrument is interpreted by some of its older friends. The powers of this Government are supposed to be limited, measured, and bounded by the provisions of that Constitution. In determining, then, what the Government can do we have been accustomed heretofore, and ought, Mr. Chairman, to be accustomed now, to recur to the Constitution to ascertain what the governmental powers are, and what the Government is. But the governmental powers are, and what the Government is. But the gentleman from Illinois goes out upon a broad voyage of discovery and exploration, and winds up with the announcement that we have rights and powers under our Constitution as boundless as any other nation on the earth can claim.

Now, what some other nation has the right to do depends, so far as its own internal structure is concerned, upon its constitution and upon its form of government. It has no relation whatever to our system. What it has the right to do, so far as the world is concerned, depends not so much upon its constitution or upon its government, as a matter of theory and philosophy, as, practically and ultimately, upon the power of its army and its navy to carry forward such policies as it may please to advance. That is just where the matter stands as between the Government of the United States and foreign governments, according to the best interpretation of our Constitution and the practice under their

This is simply a deficiency bill which has been presented here This is simply a deficiency bill which has been presented here by the Committee on Appropriations for our action. There is a provision in this bill for the erection of barracks—a military post—at Manila, in the Philippine Islands, established upon a permanent basis; and in establishing that military post, we are told by the gentleman from Illinois, we are doing right, because, he says, we differ from other nations in that we do right while they do wrong. We must assume, then, I suppose, that we are doing right in the establishment of the permanent military barracks at Manila.

The gentleman appealingly and elegently illustrated the im-

The gentleman appealingly and eloquently illustrated the impregnability of his position, and he says that he has time and time again saved one-half hour's expenditure of time by the emtime again saved one-half hour's expenditure of time by the employment of the illustration. He did this when he cited the case of the young couple who had twins but would have been entirely satisfied with, and would have positively enjoyed the blessing of, one child in the family. Does the gentleman look upon the inhabitants of the Philippines as in the relation of twinship with the people of this Republic? Does he regard them as on a par with our American citizenship? I, for my part, repudiate any such twinship, any such relationship. The American people and the Filipinos were not born twins, and are not and in the future will not be "twins."

Their births did not take place at the same time, so far as their relationship to this Government are concerned. They are not of relationship to this Government are concerned. They are not of the same stock. Politically they have not the same paternity or the same maternity. They have not the same achievements or the same objects. They have not the same prospects or the or the same objects. They have not the same prospects or the same hopes in life. The one constitutes the citizenship of the mightiest Republic upon the earth, a people who hertofore have devoted themselves to the glories of free government at home and to the glories of the just administration of affairs in our foreign relation.

The Filipinos, unhappily, have been dependents and the victims of tyranny for three hundred years, and when they hoped that by their own exertions and by our timely aid they had escaped from the taskmaster and achieved their own independence, lo and from the taskmaster and achieved their own independence, lo and behold, by the administration of such gentlemen as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] and those who subscribe to and entertain the same philosophy, they found themselves face to face with the unexpected condition that the rescuer was merely going to take the place—was determined to take the place—of the despoiler from whom they had escaped. And yet we are told the relation is that of twinship, and the anecdote of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] not only saves time, but makes clear his understanding of what he says. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman says that we are to hold these islands in perpetity. He says it is a condition; that we have them and can not tuity. He says it is a condition; that we have them and can not get rid of them. He says that upon this side we had as much to do with bringing on the war with Spain as those upon that side, and therefore the conclusion which he would draw, but which is totally unwarranted and totally unsupported in logic and in facts, is that we are as much responsible as gentlemen upon that side for our present relations to the Philippine Islanders. I deny it.

The war for the relief of Cuba; the war to aid the Cuban in his struggle against tyranny and for freedom; the war that was launched with a brave declaration of patriotic unselfishness, made here and echoed in the other Chamber; the war that the Ameriican people took up as a war of relief, a war of patriotism, a war ican people took up as a war of relief, a war of patriotism, a war of humanity, was not designed by us as a war of subjugation. It was not designed by us as a war of spoliation. In its objects and in its fruits it was not turned by us into criminal aggression, to a perversion of every principle of the Republic, to the assertion of every doctrine and the emulation of every practice of despotism. That does not lie with us. We do not carry that responsibility. The guilt is not upon us. You must bear that burden required the second of the second yourselves.

Is it true that there is any connection, logically and naturally patriotically and constitutionally, between the war for the relief of Cuba and a perpetual occupation of the distant Philippine Islands by force of arms, the subjugation of their inhabitants, the forcing of our Government upon them, the maintenance, at tremendous cost in blood and in treasure to the American people, of an alien rule over an alien race? I deny that there is any connection. We were not bound to acquire the Philippine Islands. If we had adhered to the spirit in which we engaged in the war, if we had been true to the lofty purposes and the holy traditions of our own country and our own Government we never would have acquired them.

We would have scorned the suggestion that, starting in as deliverers, starting in as the champions of freedom, as the rescuers of the oppressed, we ourselves in turn should become the spoilsmen and the oppressors and the tyrants. We would have scorned the suggestion; we would have had nothing to do with the islands except to give over their control gladly, not grudgingly, to the people who dwelt there and who had endured many things grievous to be borne and multitudes of whom had died in the effort to free themselves from Spanish tyranny.

to free themselves from Spanish tyranny.

And what we ought to have done then, we still can do. The door is not closed. What bars us? What fell agency stands between the great American Republic and the right? What is across our pathway leading as honor directs, to where glory may be won by the doing of a just and generous deed? Point it out. Where is the goblin? Where is the opposing force? Where is the impassible barrier? It is merely a figment of the imagination of gentlemen, merely a phantom of their waking dreams. Why, the gentleman's own philosophy—that we are as powerful as any other nation that whatever any nation can do we have the power other nation, that whatever any nation can do we have the power and the right to do-is a refutation of his claim.

Do we lack the power and the right to take the hand of the spoilsman from off the islands of the far-away seas? Do we lack the power and the right to give liberty to 10,000,000 people who are struggling and dying for it? Do we lack the power and the right to take the mailed hand from the throats of men who are crying out for liberty and for independent national existence? Ah, no; we do not lack either the power or the right. Who is to

Not a nation upon the earth to oppose, not an obstacle in our path, not a power but our own greed and vanity and selfishness to stand in the way of a grand achievement, by a grand Republic—

the crowning by grand and glorious deeds of a grand and glorious war, undertaken for liberty and humanity. There is no difficulty in the way except our own perversity, no difficulty in the way except the juggling with the Constitution which some of the gentleman's friends are doing. There is no trouble for us if we will do Something has been said about our duty to other nations. What duty have we to other nations that compels us to emulate them in tyranny? What duty have we to other nations that calls upon us to abandon the teachings and the principles of our own Constitution, to spit upon our own records, to stultify ourselves at home and abroad? None. And yet the gentlemen comes in here with his bill, without a suggestion in his report that this is new legislation, without the caution mark that is ordinary in an appropriation bill when it carries new legislation.

He comes in with this $500,000 Manila barracks item, which has been usurped from the Committee on Military Affairs. If there are armaments to be made or quarters to be built, if there is business of that kind to be done, there is a committee of this House whose duty it is to consider it; not the committee that has usurped the consideration of it, not the committee that has usurped the consideration of it, not the committee that has magnified itself into great notoriety, but the committee charged with the duty, under the rules of the House, to consider and report upon such matters.

Why does the gentleman rush into it? Why is this brief little report of a few lines brought here to the House, covering up and hiding rather than disclosing and revealing what this bill contains? Why? Because some other nation may do it? Because our Committee on Appropriations has the same power and right as any other committee appointed to a similar office in any other nation? Even if that be conceded, will the gentleman follow it up with the other part of the declaration, that this Committee on Appropriations here differs from other committees on appropriations in other lands in that they can do wrong, but this committee does what is right, and only what is right?

The gentleman from Illinois is further ready, as he tells us, to provide liberally for a committee or commission to go abroad to the coronation of the King of England. He tells us how he adores the Anglo-Saxon language; how sweet to his senses and how soothing to his care and Anglo-Saxon words; how he large they words. ing to his ears are Anglo-Saxon words; how he loves those words; and how England is the mother country; and how its civilization is the same as ours. What is the civilization which Britain is furnishing to the world, in example, to-day? What is it?

Upon the fields of South Africa behold as gallant a people as ever had an existence in the history of the world, struggling and dying man after man, and not only men, but women and children, in the defense of home, in the defense of country, in the defense of liberty, in the defense of a republic—against what? Against that "civilization" that is striving with might and main, in overwhelming force, by all the arms and agencies that a mighty nation can bring against a weak nation, by all the force that aggressive wrong can hurl upon defenseless right, not only to crush out the life of the South African Republic, but to destroy utterly, root and branch, everything, great or small, old or young, armed or unarmed, that breathes in that South African country the breath of freedom, that scorns tyranny, that loves liberty and home well enough to fight and die for them.

That is the "civilization" which is said to be part and parcel

That is the "civilization" which is said to be part and parcel of ours—the same kind as ours.

True we are furnishing something of an exemplification of civilization of that kind; but I believe that when the American people realize its enormity, realize what it is, when their pride is stirred, when their memories are quickened, and when they review and study our glorious history and glorious achievements and the grand institutions of our own favored land, then in their sober second thought, with the scales dropped from their eyes, with patriotism bounding and bubbling in their hearts, with sympathy actuating them in thought and in purpose—I can not but believe that when them in thought and in purpose—I can not but believe that when that time comes—God speed its coming!—the American people will not suffer themselves to be made the dupes of those who would have them furnish examples of the "civilization" whose purpose is spoliation, whose course is the track of the storm, whose purpose is the calm of the desert, the quiet of death.

I do not believe in that brand of civilization. Let us turn from it to the prender and grander civilization and citizenship of the

I do not believe in that brand of civilization. Let us turn from it to the prouder and grander civilization and citizenship of the American Republic. In spite of everything tending to discredit him, with his love of liberty as a talisman, the true American, I believe, will yet demand that right be done at home and abroad. You can not get away from these islands! Oh, no; honor is involved. How tender some gentlemen are upon this subject of honor! Honor in turning against a weak ally! Honor in turning our own arms against the feeble men who fought by our side and aided in our success! Honor in crushing to earth those who aspire to liberty! Honor in dealing destruction, in the name of our Republic, upon the creators and devotees of another republic, Republic, upon the creators and devotees of another republic, even in the far-off islands of the sea! I do not understand it so.

I do not believe that the American people in their sober second thought will so understand it.

What spirit of grasping, what genius of greed, what perverted sentiment prompted us in setting the Constitution aside and forgetting all of our past? What blindness permitted us to enter into this treaty by which we acquired those islands from a vanquished foe lying prostrate at our feet, beaten here and beaten everywhere, not having anything in the islands and nothing of title to them except what had been obtained and lost by three hundred years of crime?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him

a question? Mr. DE ARMOND.

Certainly.
Would it not be well in asking the neces-Mr. GROSVENOR. sity of that treaty for that gentleman to include one William Jennings Bryan, and ask him why he procured by his own exer-

Jennings Bryan, and ask him why he procured by his own exertion the ratification of that treaty?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, of course I am not authorized to answer for William Jennings Bryan; nor am I nearly as able, if authorized, as a certain other gentleman was to speak for his successful competitor in the Presidential race. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I have no authorization whatever; and so I can say, gently, kindly, and confidentially, in this august presence, that I am not authorized even as was the gentlemen who assumed to speak for the Presidential competitor of Mr. man who assumed to speak for the Presidential competitor of Mr. William Jennings Bryan; I have no more authority to speak for him than I have to speak for Mr. Bryan. Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me a statement?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes; this is interesting.
Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from Missouri knows what every other honest man knows, that I never in my life, here or anywhere else, in public or in private, assumed to speak for the successful competitor of William J. Bryan. It has been the successful competitor of William J. Bryan. It has been stated here over and over again, and has not escaped the knowledge of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would not by even an inadvertence do the gentleman from Ohio any harm, and of course I would not magnify his office against his protest. [Laughter.] I did not say that the gentlemen ever asserted an authority on the part of the President of the United States to speak for the President. But there was something in the manner of the gentleman from Ohio; there was something in the all-persuasiveness of the statements which he would make; there was something in that air of authority and sanctity that somehow gathers about him [laughter]; there was something that echoed in the tones of his voice; something that appeared in the attitude and beamed from the countenance of the gentleman [laughter], which suggested that the gentleman did not care to combat the idea of inspiration, if it were abroad.

Now, I find that it was all like so many other things, a mere illusion, a mere appearance, a mere seeming. [Laughter.]

But to recur to William Jennings Bryan. I have said that I had no authority to speak for him; he is one of those gentlemen who speaks for himself, and does it exceedingly well. [Applause.] Yet I would like to advert for a moment to the suggestion which the gentleman from Ohio made concerning Mr. Bryan and the treaty. I have not much doubt that the gentleman himself and other gentlemen who talk from the same standpoint and for the same purpose, like the gentleman from Illinois, desiring to economize time, find it convenient in talking about the treaty and the Philippine problem to note Mr. Bryan's attitude and quote from Mr. Bryan's utterances on the subject, and then pass on.

Let us have a few words, if we can, of clear, common sense, and a historical account of that matter. In the first place, Mr. Bryan was for the ratification of the treaty. I say now, as I have said many times in public and in private, that I believe now, and have always believed since the question arose, that Mr. Bryan was wrong, and that it would have been far wiser, far better, if Mr. Bryan had said nothing on the subject, entertaining the views that he did entertain upon it. I will tell you how the question of whether the treaty ought to be ratified presented itself to Mr. Bryan. Mr. Bryan's error was due to overconfidence in the American people. I hope that future events will show that he was right, although the manifestation that he was right be a little tardy in appearing.

Mr. Bryan was of the opinion that as the war was actually over, as the fighting was done, the expense of maintaining a large army ought to be lifted from the shoulders of the American army ought to be litted from the shoulders of the American people; that the danger in camp of idleness, dissipation, and sickness to the soldiers, who had nothing more to do until formally discharged, ought to be avoided and ended. Mr. Bryan did not believe that the treaty was good, that the treaty was what it ought to be, and he never said that or anything like it; but he believed that inasmuch as the treaty had been made, inasmuch as it was the only treaty pending, inasmuch as its ratification would be to formally end the war and discharge the soldiers who then were useless, it would be better to ratify it and trust to the sense and fairness and patriotism of the American people to deal later with the questions involved.

He favored the ratification of the treaty, but he did not favor the imposing of our Government upon the inhabitants of the Phil-ippine Islands. Upon the contrary, he trusted to the great, broad, patriotic spirit of the American people to relieve them from such control as we acquired under the treaty, set them upon their feet, and bid them Godspeed as they would make their way into the family of nations, and watch over them a little time with disinterested care.

So, whatever gentlemen may think—and I have said what I think about the wisdom of the ratification of that treaty—whatever gen-tlemen may think about it, what you have done since the ratification, and what you did not intimate or declare you would do, is not at all chargeable to anyone on this side, or chargeable to Mr.

Bryan.

Had you declared that your purpose was to hold the Philippine Islands perpetually; that it was your purpose to hold those people down at the point of the bayonet; that it was your purpose to establish and maintain a perpetual colonial government upon the other side of the world; that it was your purpose to expend seventy-five to one hundred million dollars of the American people was approach to any one purpose of that performance abroad: ple's money annually in carrying on that performance abroad; that it was your purpose to fill the churchyards in city and town and country with the bravest and best of the young manhood of the land in sustaining that policy—had you proclaimed these things, your treaty never would have been ratified; your treaty never could have been ratified. [Applause on Democratic side.]

And how weak is your defense now; how short are you now of reasons for what you have done or excuse for it, when you appeal to the fact that Mr. Bryan was in favor of the ratification of the treaty as a reason for all that you have done and an excuse for all treaty as a reason for all that you have done and an excuse for all that you may do. It will not answer.

I go as far as you go in the expression of a difference in judgment from Mr. Bryan on that point. The ratification of the treaty was one thing. But the things that you dared not hint at, things which most of you did not dream of, things which if announced would have appalled you, things which you would have declared your opposition to, things which you have since done and things which you are about things which you are now doing and things which you are about to do—they are quite different from anything that was thought of at the time as involved in the ratification of that treaty. Do not charge your swinging away from American principles and from your solemn professions to anybody but yourselves.

There was pending in the Senate at the time this treaty was ratified, if I recollect aright—when you had not disclosed your position on this question—a resolution declaring it to be the policy of the United States to give freedom to these islanders. policy of the United States to give freedom to these Islanders. There was not one man in ten in the country who believed when that treaty was ratified that you were going to hold the islands as an American possession at the point of the bayonet; that you were going to force alien rule upon the inhabitants there; that you were going to endeavor to make in the far-away seas another Poland or Ireland; that you were going to follow the "civilization" of Great Britain as exemplified in South Africa.

There was not a hint of that. American sense and American patriotism were against it. By pretense, by subterfuge, by concealment, by inroads upon the Constitution, by disregard of the plainest mandates of the law, you are now doing that which then you did not even threaten, and which a large number of you then would have hittorly energed.

would have bitterly opposed.

You can not now escape the responsibility for this; it is upon you. Time and time again you have been appealed to, not in the spirit of partisanship, but in the spirit of broad Americanism, for our common country, above party and independent of party, to preserve our institutions, to tarnish not our good name, to sully not our banner, to foster liberty instead of implanting tyranny, to make people free instead of making them slaves—to give to the Filipinos what you claimed for yourselves instead of denving it to them. denying it to them.

In closing, I appeal to you, if I may, speaking for myself, to let the question drop out of politics, not force it into politics. I ap-peal to you as Americans; I appeal to you as descendants of our sires of 1776; I appeal to you upon the common, broad, elevated ground of American patriotism to recur to American principles, to stand by the Constitution, to cease this policy of terrorism and destruction in those far-away islands, and allow a republic which you blighted and destroyed to spring up again and flourish there, with no American hand to strike it down. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand what purport to be the notes of an extract from a speech made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] during my absence from the House. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

How much can we get out of it? Why, I remember a long time ago in this House that somebody asked my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenors] how long he intended to hold these islands. He replied that "we intended to hold them until we could squeeze all the money out of them we could get." That was just exactly the same language that my distinguished fellow citizen, Jesse James, used about holding up a railroad train [Laughter], "until he could get all the money out of it he could;" and he kept up that business until a Democratic governor laid him away in his grave.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would be glad if the gentleman from Missouri would state when those remarks were made by "the gentleman from Ohio."

Mr. CLARK. Why, Mr. Chairman, I can not give the date—the gentleman has made so many speeches in this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will give—

Mr. CLARK. Wait a minute. They were made during some of the innumerable set-tos which have taken place about this of the innumerable set-tos which have taken place about this colonial business--somewhere from the beginning to the last.

colonial business—somewhere from the beginning to the last.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will give the gentleman the date when they were not made. I never made such remarks—neither here nor elsewhere. I imagine the gentleman has probably tortured a few remarks that fell from my lips on one occasion upon the top of the Allegheny Mountains into an understanding something like this, and if he has carried that recollection with him up to this time it must have been a very unpleasant one to him. There are several gentlemen in the House who were present at that debate and can say if I used such language.

Mr. CLARK. This was said on the floor of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have never said such a thing in my life. I have never thought such a thing, and do not know of anybody who does think it, unless it be the gentleman from Missouri himself, and his imagination is so fertile and so genial that it is possible in some way he has succeeded in finding something somewhere or some suggestion of something of the kind. But, I repeat, I never used the expression. I have never said such a thing and never expect to.

And, Mr. Chairman, let me say that this is the second time that the gentleman from Missouri has made such a statement, and both times in my absence, and I will be greatly obliged to him if he will search the Congressional Record through for anything will search the Congressional Record through for anything that he thinks will justify him in that suggestion. Search the records, for in them ye think ye have proof of your statement, and they are they which testify the truth.

But, Mr. Chairman, I shall not associate the gentleman from Missouri with Jesse James, but rather with one of Captain Marryat's characters—not exactly a human character, but that character may have suggested to the gentleman his imagery in regard to the Philippine Islands. Snarleyow was a scuttler, and I fear my friend will turn out to be one.

Now, I wish to speak upon another question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. De Armond], who has just taken his seat, has repeated the able speech that he made a few days ago in large part. I always like to hear it. It is a very eloquent argument, but would have been much more forcible if it were not for the fact that it was the current stock in trade of the campaign period of 1900, and made with the same degree of vigor and earnestness everywhere, and by a thousand men in the United States, made in a thousand newspapers in the United States, and overwhelmin a thousand newspapers in the United States, and overwhelmingly repudiated by the people of the United States in the election which immediately followed.

But I want to speak upon another question for a very few moments, and much more to ask the indulgence of the House at the close of my remarks than for the remarks themselves. The United States is a very great country. That will scarcely be questioned. To-day in all of the mighty industries of the world the United States stands No. 1—the greatest producer of all that falls from the labor of the hand of man. To-day we are sending our magnificient products into every civilized country of the earth, and finding a market under the very eaves and upon the very threshold of the manufactories of the Old World. Great strife for commercial supremacy is going on, and in very large part the United States stands the successful rival and undisputed competitor not alone of any one of the nations, but of all the nations of the world; and this is largely due to the fact that all the nations of the world are in large part joined together for the purpose of standing by each other and protecting their markets and disposing of their products, the result of their great industrial systems amongst each other.

Now, in the matter of production, the products of manufacturing establishments in the United States, we produce cheaper than anybody else, and in the matter of this production we stand at the very head of the list of the nations in that great sphere of national independence—the production of food supplies. In this no country can compete with our own. And yet, sir, there is one fact alone that mars the history and statement of our great success. There is one condition that stands in the way of the growth of our national independence, and our national supremacy in these matters in all of the mighty productions of our country as compared with the other countries of the world—our products that are going abroad day by day and thronging the markets of the Old World, and not only to the civilized nations of the Old World, but to the semicivilized countries and to the oriental countries as well—and that is that we are carrying in our own ships and under our own flag less than 8 per cent of the 100 per cent of our products which we thus ship abroad.

We are levying tribute upon all the nations of the earth in the sale to them of our products of the field and the factory; we are levying tribute upon all the nations of the world and compelling them by force of our competition to purchase from us; we are forcing upon the world the great productions of this country in a fair share and degree, and yet we are paying to-day to the people of the Old World, in cash, out of the pockets of the American people, $200,000,000, or about that sum, annually for the single item of the carriage and freight and transportation upon the products of the American people.

I know it has been stated, Mr. Chairman—and in this connection let me say that it is a most erroneous and misleading statement—that we are constantly showing an increase in our foreign transportation; that our merchant marine is certainly and steadily growing, and attention is called to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation of the Treasury Department to show the number of ships we are building in the United States, and it is a fact that during the year ending on the 1st of January we built more ships in the United States than in any other year of our history.

But it is also equally true and a fact worthy of consideration,

Mr. Chairman, that only one of these ships was a first-class ocean-

Mr. Chairman, that only one of these ships was a first-class oceangoing ship for the foreign trade between the United States and the foreign countries of the world. Our legislation has built up our coastwise trade, and our shippards have been busy in this class of building. But this condition does not apply to our foreign trade and our foreign shipping. So that instead of our foreign trade in our own ships and under our own flag growing in this country it is going the other way, and going the other way at a rate startling to the American people.

We have the raw material for the building of ships cheaper than any other great nation of the world. We have the finished product for the manufacture of great ships quite as cheaply furnished as in any other country of the world; but the trouble about our shipbuilding consists in the fact that we pay to the laborer of the United States engaged in that industry far higher wages than any other country of the world. But that is not the real question. That is not the thing that underlies our disadvantage and places us in the secondary position which we occupy. It is and places us in the secondary position which we occupy. It is because we are paying such enormous wages to our seamen, 40 per cent more, I am told, at the lowest and most favorable com-putation to the American shipowner and ship manager, 40 per cent in addition to the average wages paid to the foreign sailor cent in addition to the average wages paid to the foreign salior are paid by the American owner to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose on this occasion to argue out the reasons for all this. Great Britain has been our greatest competitor, and she has ruled the waves in her domination of the marine service of the world; but the time has come when by the testimony of British boards of trade and British when, by the testimony of British boards of trade and British mercantile associations and British shipping organizations, we discover conclusively that other nations are gaining upon Great Britain. During the last summer an investigation took place by a committee of the board of trade of London to ascertain as far as possible what was the real difficulty in the way of British trade; why it was that France and Germany, and even Norway and some of the other countries of Europe, were steadily gaining in the amount of their shipping and in the control of the mercan-tile business of the world.

With the consent of the House, which I propose to ask at the close of what I have to say, I shall put in the RECORD a condensed, but accurate, résumé of the testimony taken before this body, showing exactly this state of facts: That every civilized nation that operates upon the sea recognizes the fact that the nation that that operates upon the sea recognizes the fact that the nation that subsidizes its shipping is the nation that is growing in the control of the markets of the world. It is not alone the carrying of the product of American industry on the foreign ship into the foreign market. We must have lines of ships ready and willing to carry our products to the new markets where our interests have been developed. It is impossible to suppose that a German line of steamers will carry our merchandise upon most favorable terms to points in Europe where the markets may be most adventageous to points in Europe where the markets may be most advantageous to us. On the contrary, if we would avail ourselves of those markets that are standing ready for our invasion we must invade them with the American ship, under an American registry, willing to go where American genius has blazed the way and discovered the market.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes. Mr. THAYER. Are you Mr. THAYER. Are you aware that there is now in process an amassing of capital, a uniting of four of the shipbuilding and ship navigating companies of this country, and the same number in Great Britain, in anticipation of uniting with four French and German lines in one grand combine?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not aware of it, nor do I believe it.

Mr. THAYER. You saw it in yesterday's paper?
Mr. GROSVENOR. I saw in yesterday's paper a great many things besides that, some of which I knew to be true and some of which I doubted.

Mr. THAYER. This is a Republican paper which made the statement

Mr. GROSVENOR. But you must remember that Republican papers talk with Democrats sometimes. [Laughter.] I do not know anything about the proposed community of interest which know anything about the proposed community of interest which has been suggested among some of the great steamship lines of Europe. But no subsidy bill will benefit those people, because by the very terms of the bill not one of them can have an interest in any subsidy bill introduced in this Congress. Therefore, if what the gentleman has stated be true, the sooner the American people break down any combination of the character he mentions by a general subsidizing of everybody's freight ship that wants to carry American products to foreign countries, the sooner we will be rid of the effect of any oppressive combine like that.

Mr. THAYER. Is it not true that the bill must be very differently drawn from the one which was considered here at the last

ently drawn from the one which was considered here at the last session?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will do me the favor to read the bill I think he will discover that it has been framed very largely to meet the objections which the gentleman and others made in the last session; and I have no doubt that the gentleman will be just as ready with a new set of objections to the bill that has been framed to meet his objections. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the point of these reports is this, and I do not wish to be diverted from it, for I do not intend now to make an exhaustive discussion of the shipping subsidy bill, nor of the river and harbor subsidy bill, nor of the irrigation subsidy bill, nor any of the other subsidy bills that we have before this House. But I want to point out that in the ratio that any one of the civilized countries of the world has subsidized its steamships, the trade of that country has all the time increased; and in the ratio that it has gone ahead of another, that country's trade in foreign markets has been increased, while the other countries have fallen

Now, Mr. Chairman, without taking any further time, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the Record, as a part of my remarks, the statements which I have referred to, with other statements illustrative of the same proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now. Mr. Chairman, before I close I want.

[After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, before I close I want to call attention to another argument which we shall no doubt hear. I want to refer to it simply for the purpose of putting in the Record a sufficient answer to it. I hold in my hands a newspaper publication, from the State of Connecticut, I believe. At all events, it contains a suggestion made about a remedy for all the ills we are laboring under, under the head of "Strong opposition to the state of the sition to the subsidy proposition." It is this:

There is a simple and certain way to build up our merchant marine, the way it was done under the navigation laws prior to 1828. A method analogous to and on all fours with the principles of a protective tariff, the only way that the Republican party has been pledged to, and that is by a discriminating duty. This method admits of no appropriations, no inequality, no injustice, no intricacy, absolutely legal, open to the poor as well as the rich. It is just, it is proper. It is strictly in keeping with the principles of the Republican party, and, more, it is truly American.

Yours, very truly,

W. S. MANNING.

It will be very strange if our Democratic friend should be found in favor of a discriminating duty.

It was the doctrine of the Republican party, apparently inadvertently adopted and put into one or two national platforms, based upon the operation of the law of 1828, or the one referred to by the gentleman who writes that article, and I want to submit a sufficient answer to the whole idea of discriminating duties, and I will read from the report which I had the honor to make on the subsidy bill two years ago:

The first measure suggested in the last Congress was that of discriminating duties on imports. In support of that method of relief it has been said that while the United States imposed discriminating duties in the earlier history of the Republic our commerce under our flag very largely increased. That it did increase during a period when a law for discriminating duties was in force is undoubtedly true, but that it increased for that reason is, in very large degree, an erroneous conclusion. As to countries with which we had no treaties of equal commercial rights, and with the territories of Great Britain in North America and to a certain extent with the West Indies, we were free to make such discriminations in favor of our own flag, but the trade arising under those conditions was comparatively small, and in most cases ships and cargoes under our flag were in such other countries and territories put at a disadvantage equivalent, and sometimes more than equivalent, to our discrimination.

In all such cases retaliation, in one form or another, is almost the necessary consequence, as we have ourselves proved in recent years, as well as earlier ones, in our own measures, usually confided to the discretion of the President, to meet what we conceived to be unequal and excessive exactions on our ships and cargoes in such foreign ports. Under present circumstances, it is sufficient to say that in a resort to discriminating duties, even if it were supposed we could impose them, their effect would not be to produce the result desired. Our existing treaties with every commercial nation on the globe forbid such discrimination, except, as we have stated, in respect of British North America and to a degree with the British West Indies.

Looking at the immediate and urgent necessity of measures for the public welfare arising from the conditions we have already stated, it is obvious that if Congress were willing to authorize the President to terminate all these commercial treaties, the time required—one or two years after notice given—would be so great as in a large degree to diminish the advantages of immediate action. And it may be added that it is open to the gravest question whether the resort to discriminating duties, if we were free to do so at this moment, would be of advantage to the United States. We may, therefore, leave out of the question this method of accomplishing the end desired.

That is an answer to the whole of this editorial suggestion on

That is an answer to the whole of this editorial suggestion on the result of discriminating duties. Why, Mr. Chairman, the proposition has grown up in various Administrations of the Government until we find ourselves not only in the position where discriminating duties would be met by retaliatory duties, but discriminating duties would be met by the announcement at once of nearly all the civilized countries of the world that our commercial treaties had been abrogated by our own violation of the treaties.

Mr. Chairman, with these remarks I conclude the speech so far as the present is concerned. I shall not attempt to reply to the speech of the gentleman from Missouri at this time. There is a campaign coming some time during the fall of the present year, when stump speeches will again be in order, but I think it will be well for the Republican side of the House to make no response to speeches that were repudiated in 1900, but be prepared with a fresh outfit when the issues in 1902 shall be before the people.

The following is the statement referred to in my remarks:

SIR: The subsidizing of shipping for the purposes of increasing our resources of national defense, for increasing our foreign trade, and for securing assured stability of transportation, is one of the subjects commanding wide-spread attention, in view of legislation now pending in Congress and before the committee of which you are chairman. In these circumstances, and being mindful of the importance of having placed before your committee and Congress, and thus the people at large, late information of value on the subject, I have ventured in the following pages to lay before your common of the facts and opinions contained in a report on steamship subsidies issued on August 1, 1901, by a select committee of the British Parliament, acting under the following resolution:

August 1, 1901, by a select committee of the British Parliament, acting under the following resolution:

"Thursday, May 23, 1901.

"Ordered, That it be an instruction to the select committee appointed to inquire into the system of subsidies to steamship companies under foreign governments and the effect thereby produced on British trade that they do also report on similar bounties to sailing ships."

The report in question is inconclusive, except as to the testimony and subsidiary reports presented, which sets forth the views of the leading officials of the British Government concerned with the foreign trade of that Empire and of the shipowners and shipbuilders interested in its promotion. Considering the leading position occupied by British shipbuilding and shipowning in the world's commerce, it seems to me that too much weight and consideration can not be given by either Congress or the American people to the matter elicited. Right here it may be proper, in view of its brevity, to insert the report of the select British parliamentary committee on steamship subsidies:

"Your committee are of the opinion that at this late period of the session it will not be in their power to conclude their investigation. They have therefore agreed to report the evidence already taken to the house and to recommend that a committee upon the same subject be reappointed early in the next session of Parliament, August 1, 1901."

The hearings were 16 in number, beginning on June 11 and closing on August 1, 1901, the evidence alone occupying 256 pages, aggregating about 250,000 words, supplemented by some 60 pages of appendixes and a voluminous and very valuable topical alphabetical index occupying 47 additional pages.

It is proper to say that the suggestion of the parliamentary investigation 20,000 words, supplemented by some 60 pages of appendixes and a voluminous and very valuable topical alphabetical index occupying 47 additional pages.

It is proper to say that the suggestion of the parliamentary investigation arose from the apparently heavy loss of British trade with eastern South Africa and the accompanying loss of carrying suffered by British ships through the competition of the subsidized lines of other nations, chiefly Germany. It was intended that the original scope of the inquiry should be confined largely to the causes for and the remedies applicable to this condition, and the original resolution instructed the committee to "consider and report upon the political and commercial advantages to be gained by encouraging British steamers to circumnavigate Africa, especially having reference to the east coast, and to report on the best means of giving them such encouragement."

This motion, the first recorded on the subject, was offered by Mr. Evelyn Cecil, who was elected chairman of the select committee subsequently appointed. But, as I have said, the scope of the inquiry was made extremely broad, as is shown by the resolution adopted, as quoted above. Your special attention is invited to the phrasing of Mr. Cecil's motion, and to the fact that he regarded "political" no less than "commercial" considerations involved, and that he, at least, though that "political and commercial advantages" might be "gained by encouraging British steamers," and since the investigation as finally ordered was confined to the consideration of subsidies to steamships and bounties to salling vessels, it would appear that the British Parliament, at least, was ready to disregard all other methods than those in arriving at "the best means of giving them such encouragement." The significance, no less than the suggestiveness of the limitations of the scope of the investition, should not, therefore, be lost sight of by your committee or by Congress in the consideration of the exilent points contained in the testimony o

The first witness who appeared before the British Parliamentary committee was Six Alfred Bateman, the countroller-general of the commercial islaw, and spatisfied department of the board of trade, that both being, as ment. Six Alfred Bateman has been connected with his department for hirty-seven years. He first brought to the attention of the committee the month of the property of lines. It is a fair assumption that in precisely the same manner benefits would be conferred upon our own people through the establishment of an effective policy by our Government upon these lines. That is to say, rates of decretive policy by our Government upon these lines. That is to say, rates of the control of the subsidied American ships, the latter, in return, helping to fortify the nation with a resource of ships and men for auxiliary naval and the benefiting of the subsidied American ships, the latter, in return, helping to fortify the nation with a resource of ships and men for auxiliary naval and crews, and for victualing of a British and a Norwegian steamer of equal monthly in favor of the Norwegian flag." Their conclusion, that "such a variatages, together with the subsidies given by foreign nations to encourage their shipping is (sie) gradually, but surely, undermining British shipping, the subsidies in order to secure them under their own flag." Their conclusion, that "such a variates, together with the secure them under their own flag." Their conclusion, that "such a variates, together with the secure them under their own flag." Their conclusion, that "such a variates, together with the secure them under their own flag." Their conclusion, that "such a variates, together with the secure them under their own flag." The variates of the particular them to the variates of the particular them to the variates of the particular them to the variates and t stated.

In the course of Sir Alfred Bateman's testimony it was shown that one of the effects of the quite general and extensive subsidizing of foreign steamship lines by their governments had been to not only very greatly increase the commerce of the countries granting the subsidies, but it had the further effect of diverting to near-by continental ports for transshipment British goods intended for consumption in remote and distant portions of the globe, these goods going the longer distance in the subsidized foreign instead of, as formerly, in the British ships.

Although some Americans affect to deny that Great Britain gives subsidies to British ships, yet no less an authority than Sir Alfred Bateman states that "subsidies are given by the post-office, by the Admiralty, and by the colonial office, as regards the Elder-Dempster Line." In the case of the latter line it is instructive to learn that the subsidy paid, according to Sir Alfred Bateman, "has not so much to do with the carrying of mails; it has more to do with the carrying of bananas." For an annual subsidy of £40,000 the line in question agreed, among other things stipulated by the British Government, "to purchase at the current market rates of the day not less than 20,000 bunches of bananas for each voyage from Jamaica to an English port, and convey all bananas so purchased to the English port."

So the British have been able to coin a new designation of subsidies, namely, "the banana subsidy," with which to build up British shipping. We may well imagine with what derision and scorn a similar suggestion would be received in the United States, far less its actual incorporation in our national statutes. Not so, however, with the "mistress of the seas," who is at all times wide awake to British commercial and maritime interests, and hesitates at no method that will promote and conserve them. Sir Alfred Bateman also testifies that Great Britain pays one-half of a subsidy, the total of which is £27,000, for the subsidizing of a line of steamers running from Canadian to West Indian ports, but apparently not touching anywhere in the United Kingdom.

Extracts from British consular reports were read to the committee by Sir Alfred Bateman bearing upon the subject under investigation, one of which, written in 1890, read, as follows:

"A home line of English steamers, assisted by H. M. Government—for no company without a subsidy would hope to compete with the heavily subsidized foreign lines that for many years have had agencies at Zanzibar—which could carry the mails, passengers, and cargo at a fair rate of speed and which might at the same time be economically utilized to bring out the plant required for the Uganda Railway, would not only be a great boon to British commercial houses at Zanzibar but would undoubtedly prove a powerful incentive to the development of British trade throughout East Africa."

It certainly countries.

Still another British consular report, discussing the trade on the coast of China, says: "It will be seen from the above how absolutely predominant the British flag is in the carrying trade. On the coast, indeed, except for the share which falls to the China Merchants' Company, we have almost a monopoly of the business. On foreign voyages the German and French mail steamers, both of which are subsidized, take a considerable share of the export trade, especially silk, most of which is invoiced to Mediterranean ports."

The next witness was Sir Henry Bergne, who is the head of the commercial department and examiner of treaties in the British foreign office. He was asked by the chairman whether "any great distinction can be drawn between a port like Zanzibar, which is not served directly by any British steamers, and ports which are? Would it effect their trade, do you think?" To which the answer was returned: "I should think it would affect the British trade, decidedly."

In precisely the same way American trade is restricted, through the lack

In precisely the same way American trade is restricted, through the lack of direct lines of American steamers between important foreign and American ports.

The following question and answer show the value of subsidies to steamship lines and how they increase a nation's trade:

"I should like to ask you a question with regard to the statements which Sir William Ward, the British consul at Hamburg, makes with reference to the advantage of German subsidies to German lines. Have you anything to say with regard to the sea-borne trade of Hamburg with the Levant and West Africa?—I think the one which shows the greatest increase is the German Asiatic line. * * * The tables together show that in 1888 the volume and value of goods carried out and homeward was £951,000 and £1,400,000. In 1898 the amounts were £2,658,000 of the first class and £3,292,000 of the second. That is a very considerable increase."

the amounts were £2,68,000 of the first class and £3,29,000 of the second. That is a very considerable increase."

With reference to the growth of the Austrian sugar export trade the witness was questioned as to whether or not the increase was in Austrian or foreign ships, the witness finally showing that almost without exception Austrian ships did the carrying.

It was shown that while there had not been any great increase in the exports to India from foreign countries in competition with Great Britain, in the exports from India there had been large gains made by the Germans and gains by other nations, with an actual decrease in the value of the exports to Great Britain, which led to the following question and answer, inferentially explanatory of the loss to the British and the gain to the foreign competitors:

"You are aware, are you not, that all the steamers running to India are very heavily subsidized." Yes.

"And the German, Austrian, French, and Italian steamers are very heavily subsidized, are they not?—Certainly."

In seeking information as to increases and decreases of trade, the committee asked searching questions as to whether the losses also fell upon British ships as well—whether the gains in trade and in carrying were enjoyed by foreigners—one of the members of the committee, in the course of asking a question along this line, saying:

"It is far more important to have the nationality of the carrying ships than it is to have the volume of trade." That is to say, the loss of trade might be borne, but the loss of shipping could not be.

As bearing upon the influence of subsidies upon trade, the following questions and answers, in the examination of Sir Henry Bergne, are instructive:

"Now, please, will you give the figures for Natal.—The figures for Natal are as follows (expressed in pounds sterling): In 1895 the total import was 1,518,000, of which British was 1,734,000 and German 19,500. The exports for that year totaled 8,77,000, of which British was 1,734,000 and German 51,815. The exports for year were 1.885,000, of which British was 778,090 and German 413,000, as compared with 84,000 in the year 1895.

"Does that include coal, do you suppose?—No, I should not think so; I do not know what it may be—it may be that the full returns give the details of the trade, but I have not them with me.

"Of course the German East African steamers have been more directly in communication during these eight or ten years with Natal than they have with the Cape, have they not?—I think so.

"They did not run to the Cape at all, did they?—No; they only established the round service last year, I think.

"So that in the Cape figures the question of German subsidized ships does not come into consideration, does it?—Hardly.

"But so far as Natal is concerned, they have existed since the time the first subsidy was given?—Quite so."

There is food for serious reflection in the foregoing. If we substitute South America for Africa and German for British ships, as compared with our own, or rather the lack of them, we see that Germany has built up and is more rapidly building up a great trade through the instrumentality of German subsidized steamship lines, with ports where but ten or fifteen years ago no trade whatever with Germany existed. To-day our trade with South America is nothing near to what it could be made with direct lines of American steamships running from American to South American ports. We lack the trade and we lack the ships. Indeed, it may be truthfully said that we lack the trade because of our lack of direct American steamship lines.

The trade with New South Wales, when examined in detail, in effect showed the same changes as did that of Natal, leading the chairman of the committee to ask:

"It is a gigantic increase compared with the British, is it not?—Yes.

the trade and we lack the ships. Indeed, it may be truthfully said that we lack the trade because of our lack of direct American steamship lines.

The trade with New South Wales, when examined in detail, in effect showed the same changes as did that of Natal, leading the chairman of the committee to ask:

"It is a gigantic increase compared with the British, is it not?—Yes.

"That is owing to the Germans starting a line between those two dates, I suppose?—No doubt."

The figures for the trade with Victoria were given, with practically the same showing of enormous gains for German and French trade, which led to the following questions and answers:

"Can you account for either this French or German increase; they seem to be a little irregular, but in general they are very decisive increases as compared with Great Britain.—I can not express any opinion about that.

"Of course substidized steamers of both those countries run to Victoria, do they not?—French subsidized steamers run everywhere, because the subsidy is on miles run.

"May we take it that the increase is mainly due to the subsidized steamers being put on these various routes?—I should think it is probable; I could not say positively."

Then the statistics regarding the trade of the other two Australian colonies were read, covering the same period and dates, which was followed by the following questions and answers:

"Generally these figures show, do they not, the same tendency, though not quite so markedly, as in some of the other Australian colonies?—That is so.

"Subsidized steamers run to those places, do they not?—I think so. The Germans do, at all events.

"With regard to the cause of the increase, I suppose your opinion would be the same as you have stated with regard to the other Australian colonies, would it not?—The increase in proportion to the total trade is much smaller in these cases, so that it is not so significant as in other cases. I am not sure whether lines run there. I can give the exact routes of the German subsidized steamers run f of a colonial policy, and of the wish to increase German prestige in certain places."

He says further:

"Then, as to Russia, in 1889, Mr. Law, who was our commercial attaché in Russia, reported that he had been unable to discover that any direct assistance was given in aid of construction, but he stated that considerable indirect assistance in the form of loans and contracts was given by the Government, and he sent information regarding the grant of Government subsidies in aid of the running of ships."

While the answer given to the following question elicited nothing in reply of value, yet it is suggestive of the thought in the mind of the chairman of the committee who asked it, and is therefore worth repeating:

"Before leaving the topic with which we have been dealing, I way to ask you one question about Zanzibar. Do you think the absence of British shipping in that quarter not merely affects British trade, but to some extent affects British prestige among the native merchants and the native population there?"

If we ever expect to secure and to hold the great bulk of the Eastern Asiatic trade, which our resources and skill and our position, as well as their necessities, justify our believing we can secure and hold, we must realize the importance of the impression we shall create in conducting that trade in alien or native ships. The natives of the Orient are as impressed with visible signs of a nation's entity, the ships of her construction and the flag that flies, no less than the cargoes therefrom, as are the denizens of Africa, and we may not expect to win their respect, their confidence, or their trade if we confess our inability to become our own shipbuilders and shipowners by sending alien vessels, under alien flags, commanded by aliens, to do our carrying and to become the go-betweens in our trade relations. Nowhere is dependence so synonymous with inferiority as with the natives of the Far East, and we shall lack their respect if we employ alien ships to do our carrying with them, and the lack of r similar inquiry with reference to the United States, how much greater would be his apprehensions regarding his country's trade and prestige through its almost total lack of ships? The inference in the last question quoted is unmistakable. It is infinitely more suggestive to us, lacking a merchant marine in the foreign trade, than it is to Great Britain, possessing, as she does, by far the larger part of all the shipping engaged in international trade. If, in their circumstances, the British have need to be concerned regarding their country's material welfare, in which a merchant shipping is so potential a factor, how much more solicitous should the American people be, considering their circumstances.

The quotations from British consular reports made by Sir Henry Bergne, following those already quoted by Sir Alfred Bateman, and bearing upon specific examples of the value of subsidies and bounties to the ships of competing nations, are of sufficient value to deserve repetition here, since the obstacles confronting British shipping in the effort under way to maintain unimpaired British mercantile sea power are far more serious to ourselves. The British own the larger part of the world's ocean-going shipping and have enjoyed for generations the command of the greater part of the world's sea carrying. If the subsidy and bounty policies of other nations arouse the fears of the British as to the future of Great Britain's maritime supremacy, as well as seriously menace their commercial predominance in the world's great markets, what does the situation teach us? Surely, as to our own trade, at least, we may hope to secure a just proportion of its carrying in our own ships by the adoption of the same policy.

The maritime policies of other nations are not directed, per se, against Great Britain's shipping, but for the establishment of commercial marines of their own, but so great has been the British ascendency in the carrying trade of other nations that any measures adopted by the latter to secure a shipping of their o by other nations be also achieved by the United States by the adoption of the same methods? In our case, however, we have little or no experience, and no prestige whatever as a maritime power; but with the British they are intrancised in experience and fortified with prestige, the result of centuries of supreme control of the world's carrying trade. Sir Henry Bergne 80". On the effect of which, with your permission, to read to the committee a few extracts which I have taken from reports received from consuls this year, which hear upon the effect of subsidies, and I think it would be of a certain amount of general interest to the committee. 'The British vice-consul at Mariupol (Kertch) reports this year. The percentage of British tomage to the total stood in 1868 at 80 per cent; 1836, 80 per cent; 1804, 36 per cent; 180

French shipping. For instance, a four-masted bark, 2,400 tons register, left Havre in ballast for Saigon, where she took in a cargo of 1,000 tons of rice for Noumea. From here she loads ore for Rotterdam, and her subsidy for the entire voyage will amount to from £6,000 to £6,400, according to the distance run. 1.10 entire voyage will amount to from £6,000 to £6,400, according to the distance run."

These French ships have already invaded the carrying trade of the United States, notably in the carrying of grain from our Pacific ports to Europe. It behoves us, therefore, to look quite as keenly to the growing competition with which we will be confronted through the operation of these heavily subsidized and bountied ships of continental Europe as to the difficulties of matching and in part overcoming the British possession of so vast a proportion of our carrying. The Germans and French are already in the field, not so numerical as the British, but nevertheless better fortified, while we, as yet, are scarcely upon the threshold of active competition. By the time we are in the field these new factors in the world's carrying trade will be even better intrenched than now to meet and oppose our efforts. But, as has been said, the inevitable reduction in freight rates, consequent upon the contest to be waged, will more than repay the people of the United States for whatever outlay they make in order to enable American ships to successfully compete. Sir Henry Bergne continues:

"Then I have an abstract from this year's report from Malaga. The vice-consul at Almeria says: 'In this connection I must point out that British shipping is considerably hampered by bounties paid to Italian vessels, which enable them to compete with our national vessels to the latter's detriment. An owner of a large fleet of British vessels, who is also one of the principal exporters of iron ore from this place, has told me that he has frequently to employ Italian vessels to carry iron ore, to his prejudice as a shipowner; that is, he would otherwise have employed his own vessels had they been on anything like equal terms, but the subsidy of the Italian Government quite handicapped them."

Here, surely, is proof of the reduction in freight charges that follows the subsidizing and bountying of a nation's shipping, and, it is to be noted, upon no other plan th

Here, surely, is proof of the reduction in freight charges that follows the subsidizing and bountying of a nation's shipping, and, it is to be noted, upon no other plan than reduced freight charges would the competition have succeeded.

In the face of this kind of testimony, how can we blind ourselves to the necessity of Government aid for the encouragement of an American mercantile marine in our foreign trade? Or how can we deny the effectiveness of subsides with their foreign rivals? How futile to assert, in the light of such statements, that subsidies and bounties are unnecessary and impotent. It should not be forgotten that the statements quoted were not made in order to warn the United States, which is merely considering the advisability of undertaking the creation of an American ocean-going mercantile marine, but, rather, to warn the nation that to day proudly boasts of unchallenged dominion of the seas. If such was the advisability of undertaking the creation of an American ocean-going mercantile marine, but, rather, to warn the nation that to day proudly boasts of unchallenged dominion of the seas. If such was the advisability of undertaking and so, possibly, inadequately prepare to carry it to success. To resume, Sir Henry Bergne was further questioned, and testified as follows:

"Are you not seen it stated in one of your reports—I do not recollect it. They are getting rather large, and I believe there has been considerable dust they think of reducing them—No. I do not remember it; it may be there for all that. I have another paper I should like to read in the same connection; it is a little long perhaps, but it is worth reading, I think. It is a dispatch we have just received from the British consultate of the state of the proof of the prepare of the subjuping bedaux, dated 36 of June, No. 8 commercial. It is addressed to the Marquis of Lansdown: 'My Lord, the question of subsidies and bounties of the pates and the subsidiary seeds of the pates and the proof of the research of the pates and the proof dividend earned being reduced, by the expenditure being 22,000 francs over working earnings, to 15.83 per cent per annum.

"The last case is that of the Admiral Troude, which, in less than eleven months, when freights were low, paid a dividend of 24 per cent per annum, of which the bounty formed 15 per cent. The effect of one of these large French vessels seeking cargo in a port where British vessels are also seeking must be disastrous to the latter, as the French vessel could accept a freight which a British vessel could not possibly afford to accept. The result of this encouragement to build sailing vessels in France is that on October 1, 1899, there were sailing vessels under construction in: France, 54.769 tons; United Kingdom, 5,164 tons; Germany, 656 tons; Italy, 3,450 tons; and that in 1893 the navigation bounties paid to French steam vessels amounted to 85 per cent and to sailing vessels 37 per cent of the navigation bounties.

"It is proposed to make in two years time a new navigation law, which will encourage the building of steam vessels in France to the same extent as the law of 1893 has encouraged the building of sailing vessels, and, although the results hitherto attained do not appear to have been satisfactory for France or injurious to British interests, chiefly, I take it, because the French have encouraged a form of propulsion already almost abandoned by other nations, there is no knowing what will be the result if France gives equal encouragement to the steamship in the future that she has given to the sailing ship in the past. The examples of the working of the bounty system which I have been enabled to give here may prove of use in helping to solve the questions which may arise when the day arrives.

With these statements before you and your committee, which could be very greatly amplified, it must be apparent that the subsidies and bounties paid to the merchant shipping of other countries are potential factors in their maritime development. In view of the extent to which the denial of eith

And if there shall be a disagreement as to such fair value the question of the valuation shall be submitted to and determined by three impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, one by the owner or owners of the vessel, and the two appraisers so appointed shall, before they proceed to act, select a third appraiser. I append an editorial from the Marine Journal of recent date:

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SHIPBUILDING.

The German campaign against the American shipping bill goes merrily on. It was inaugurated a few months ago by Herr Ballm, director-general of the Hamburg-American Line, who published an article over his own signature in many of the London newspapers, in which he attempted to show that shipping subsidies were not necessary to the development of a merchant marine. The article was evidently intended for American consumption, and it was extensively quoted here by the free-trade papers and others opposed to the shipping bill. His argument was ingenious, but fallacious. He simply pointed to the Hamburg-American Line as an example of what may be done in shipping without subsidies. Of course, he carefully omitted all mention of the fact that his company, and all other German shipping companies, receive indirect aid from the German Government and municipalities to an extent which is just as advantageous to them as a direct subsidy would be.

The latest phase of this foreign campaign against the shipping bill is a report made to his government by a German naval constructor on the condition of shipbuilding in the United States. The conclusions which he reached after his alleged investigation are that our shippards are developing with amazing rapidity, and everything relating thereto is in a condition of prosperity and advancement well calculated to alarm the great shipbuilding concerns of both Germany and Great Britain.

This German expert finds that although wages here are 40 per cent higher than in Europe, yet the cheapness of materials employed in the construction of steel ships and the superior tools used by our shipbuilders enable them to build vessels as cheaply as they can be turned out in foreign yards, they do not do it for the very good reason that our underwriters are more exacting than are the British Lloyds. The result is that an American-built tramp is more expensive and has not that tendency to go to the bott

And the following from the Washington Post of last Sunday: SHIP-SUBSIDY BILL—A FOREIGN VIEW OF THE PROPOSED MEASURE AND ITS ULTIMATE EFFECT.

EDITOR POST: There is one phase of the controversy in reference to the ship-subsidy bill which seems, curiously enough, to have escaped the notice of the opponents of the measure, both in the press and among the public, and that is the violent denunciation of the bill in the mercantile circles of Europe, more specially in Great Britain. Now, I happened to be in the quadrangle of the Liverpool Exchange talking to some English marine merchants when the news came that the shipping bill of the last session of Congress was virtually abandoned. There was considerable jubilation, and one gentleman, turning to me, exclaimed: "There, you Yankees are not going to have everything. Why, you want the earth, and then you won't be satisfied." Then others chimed in, and I had to listen to a tirade of abuse of our fiscal policy in general, especially of the attempt, as they called it, to rob England of her shipping supremacy by means of the ship-subsidy bill.

Taking advantage of a lull in the storm, I remarked quietly, "What beats me, gentlemen, is the opposition to the measure on our side of the water; why seven-tenths of our most reputable papers are against it, and if, as you say, it would be so bad for Great Britain, why it must be good for us. I must confess I don't understand it." One gentleman who had not taken much part in the conversation, but who I afterwards understood to be a shipowner, observed, "Well, I can explain that easily enough. Do you remember when Beaconsfield bought the Suez Canal shares? Well, it roused a howl of indignation throughout the country, and did more to defeat the Conservatives at the election of 1880 than the so-called Bulgarian atrocities. I have always been a Tory and am one now, but I voted, not against my party on that occasion, but against Beaconsfield and his Suez Canal schemes, as did thousands of others, although the comments of the Continental press ought to have opened our eyes. We were wrong; Beaconsfield was right. It was an ardacious but magnificent policy, and has given us cont

I listened attentively and made no comment further than to say, "Well, it's an old adage 'that outsiders see most of the game.' I suppose it is so in this case."

No American can do his own country a greater good than by ding to build up our merchant marine. No American can aid aiding to build up our merchant marine. the British producer to our injury more distinctly than by opposing such aid.

ing such aid. [Loud applause.]
Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio, General Grosvenor, says that he defies me to find in the RECORD any remark like the one I said he made. Of course, I was only quoting from memory. But the simple fact that you can not find what that gentleman said on the floor of this House in the Recwhat that gentleman said on the floor of this House in the Record is absolutely no proof whatever that he did not say it. A great many people in this House, and there are none more given to it than my friend from Ohio, have a habit of saying smart things in the heat of debate, and then going to work and editing those remarks out of their speeches. My friend has edited as much as anybody I ever saw, and he can improvise more history in a given length of time than any other man here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman that I never edited that remark out of a speech. I have edited out some colouries, but always with the consent of the other side.

loquies, but always with the consent of the other side.
Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I have really wished, as I have a very kindly feeling for the gentleman from Missouri, that he had done a little more editing himself than he has.

Mr. CLARK. Perhaps it would have been better if I had, but I am always willing to be judged by what I say in this House. Sometimes I have edited a speech to the extent of modifying some bitter thing that I had said about somebody, to make it more gen-I do not know that I can find what he said in the RECORD; I tle. I do not know that I can find what he said in the RECORD; I do not know that I can find it in a newspaper; I do not know that I quoted it precisely right, as it was said a long time ago; but, as sure as I am standing here, the gentleman said something substantially like that, and it was commented on by the papers in the country. If I can find it, I will call his attention to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will facilitate the gentleman. I do not know exactly who it was, but somebody had bawled out, "How long are we going to hold the Philippines?" and I replied that "we would hold them until we got ready to let them go," and then shot away at the other side and said that we would not ask the consent of the Democrats of this House, or something like that; but as for holding them and squeezing money out of them, which would be like squeezing blood out of a turnip, I did not say anything of that kind.

Mr. CLARK. As an ordinary proposition I would take the gentleman's word on anything except a speech he had made himself. He felicitates and vaunts himself about a debate which he and I had, for revenue only [laughter], down at a chautauqua at and I had, for revenue only [laughter], down at a chautauqua at Mountain Lake, Md., and says my recollection about that must be unpleasant. I never hear him make a remark like that that I do not think of a transaction which happened out in the State of Kansas.

In an early day out there the cashier of a bank stole all the money there was in the bank and blew it in on No. 2 wheat. The depositors caught him and were proceeding to hang him. He said he wanted to make some remarks, and they let him down.

The depositors caught film and were proceeding to hang him. He said he wanted to make some remarks, and they let him down. He declared that he desired to make a proposition; that he had no money to give them because that was all gone, but he did not want to die the ignominious death by hanging. So he proposed to them that they might cut him into pieces, and each one take the piece that suited him best. One old chap on the outside of the crowd yelled out: "The rest of you fellers take what you please, but, as for me, give me that feller's gall!" [Laughter.] Now, that is what I want. If it ever comes to pass that my friend from Ohio is dissected, the rest of you take what you please, but give me his gall. [Great laughter.]

My friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. Cannon], and my friend from Ohio, both had the same idea in their speeches. Which one of them originated it or which is entitled to that "bad eminence," I do not know, but my friend from Illinois said that I was instrumental in getting up the Spanish war, and that having gotten it up I "reninged" when it came to taking the consequences. My friend from Ohio says I am like a fictitious character named Snarlyow that he read about somewhere, who scuttled the ship. I want to say to both the venerable and illustrious gentlemen that I did help get up the Spanish war; that I did what I could to facilitate it. I recipie in that fact to day. That was nursely an American help get up the Spanish war; that I did what I could to facilitate it. I rejoice in that fact to-day. That was purely an American transaction, to make somebody free and to extend representative government on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

But I was not in favor then, and I am not in favor now, of en-slaving any human being, black, white, or brown, anywhere, either in the Eastern or Western Hemisphere. [Applause.] My friend from Illinois tells his old and delicate campaign twin story about the young couple who were disagreeably surprised by the arrival of twins; but "they had to keep them," says the gentleman, and therefore we have to keep the Philippines. Well, it so happens that twins are blessings of this life that do not come to many. I take it that a rational man would not object very much to twins born in the family of which he is the father, but he would object seriously to a lot of nondescript, saddle-colored brats being deposited surreptitiously on his doorstep. That is what I am objecting to in this Philippine business. [Laughter.]

Let us see whether we shrank from the responsibility that came from the Spanish war. That is a great philosophical and historical question. How did we go into it? Why, we went into it with the solemn resolution, passed by the lower House of Congress and the Senate of the United States and signed by William McKinley, that we were not going into it for land-grabbing purposes or for territorial constants. torial aggrandizement, and we put Cuba into that resolution. The truth about it is, gentlemen, that if the American Congress had known where the Philippine Islands were, they would have put the Philippine Islands into that resolution, too [laughter]; but we were all a little short on geographical knowledge then, and if we had been compelled to start for the Philippines instantly we would not have known whether to travel north, south, east, or

I deny that the taking and keeping of the Philippine Islands are any natural result of the Spanish war. The only possible connection between the two performances is that one happened subsequent to the other in point of time. William R. Day ought to know something about it. He was Secretary of State when that treaty was negotiated and ratified, and also head Commissioner at the Paris conference. He declared some time during sioner at the Paris conference. He declared some time during the debate in which Mr. LITTLEFIELD, of Maine, led here on the Porto Rico question—during that debate or just before or just after it—I say that William R. Day declared in public print that we did not hold the Philippine Islands by conquest, but we held them by right of purchase. I am going to hunt that document up and print it in the RECORD, too, because Republicans here are now very fond of denying it.

I want it written on my tombstone when I am dead that I was one of 35 men in this House, out of 357, that had the nerve, the courage, the patriotism, and the good sense to vote against paying Spain $20,000,000 for the Philippines, even after the Senate of the United States had ratified the treaty, for that transaction is the source of all our woes.

My friend from Illinois jogs my memory about the vote for the $5,000.000 appropriation for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. Well, it was inevitable that it had to come sooner or later, and the might as well have shot it into me as to have somebody else shoot it into somebody else. I intend to answer it once for all, so that no other man in this House will ever have to answer it again. Here is the answer. It is twofold. In the first place, if we could have gone back to the beginning of things I am not certain, if I had been a member of this House, that I ever would have voted an appropriation for any of these world's fairs in the United States. That is the first proposition. But all the rest have had them, and why should we not have it? Why make flesh of one and fowl of another?

The second answer is, and it appeals to the common sense and patriotism of every man in this House irrespective of political affiliations, that there have been a few events, very few indeed, in the history of the United States, and in the history of America, which are worthy of national commemoration, on which we can all agree as to the wisdom-things that have been epoch makers, the things that have caused us to be what we are, the most pow-erful nation on the face of the earth. The first one was the diseriui nation on the race of the earth. The first one was the discovery of America by Columbus; the second was Patrick Henry's great speech before the Virginia house of burgesses precipitating the Revolution, which still stirs the blood like strains of martial music; next the firing on the British regulars at Lexington and Concord by the New England militia and Minute Men; next the Declaration of Independence, part Weshington's continue of Veri Declaration of Independence; next Washington's capture of Lord Cornwallis on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown; next the adoption of the Constitution, and last, the Louisiana purchase— the greatest transaction in real estate bruited on this earth since the devil took the Saviour to the top of a high mountain and offered Him the dominion of the world if He would fall down and wor-

If it had not been for that purchase by Jefferson, it is extremely doubtful whether the United States could have maintained its independence. But for that we would have been hemmed in on the north by the British and on the west by the British, because it would not have been twelve months from the time we rejected the purchase that England would have gobbled up that territory from Napoleon; and if anybody except us ever took a foot of land away from England I would like to know when and where it was done. We would have had the Spanish on the south of us, and I doubt exceedingly whether this Republic, hemmed in on three sides, could have maintained its independence.

And among the blessings, numberless and rich, which flowed from the election of Thomas Jefferson in 1800, there is none that equals in importance the Louisiana purchase. If old John Adams had been elected, there never would have been an American citizen resident west of the great river; and if the landing of Columbus, if the Declaration of Independence, and if all of these other things are worth commemorating, Thomas Jefferson's greatest act is worth it; and we are going to commemorate it in the grandest exposition seen on earth since the morning stars first sang together exposition seen on earth since the morning stars first sang together for joy. My friend is cordially invited to attend.

And, while I am at it, I want to suggest to the jingoes in this House and out of it, who have for three years been wandering up and down the land making asses of themselves by declaring that the Spanish war made us "a world power," that they are exactly ninety-five years behind the times. Thomas Jefferson made us "a world power" on the 30th day of April, 1803, when he bought for a song from the armed soldier of democracy a country greater. for a song from the armed soldier of democracy a country greater than that over which the mad Macedonian waved his all-conquering banner, or over which the Roman eagles flew. And this country owes it to Jefferson's memory, if to nothing else, to have a commemoration of that event.

Even Thomas Jefferson himself, who divides with King Solomon and Lord Bacon the honor of being the wisest man that ever lived, had no adequate conception of the vast importance and farreaching influence on human affairs of the wondrous bargain in real estate which he secured from the martial Corsican. One of the strangest omissions in all literature was made by him, when, having sounded all the shoals and depths of honor, he failed to refer in any way to the great purchase in the famous epitaph which he prepared for his own monument, and which runs in this

Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the American Declaration of Independence, of the statute of Virginia for religious freedom, and father of the University of Virginia.

These were magnificent deeds-immortal achievements-each These were magnificent deeds—immortal achievements—each ample to give him imperishable renown, and for which we are all his debtors forever and forever; but, if he could have comprehended the full and marvelous effects of his unequaled trade with the First Consul, he would have added to that epitaph a fourth claim to the eternal admiration and gratitude of his countrymen and to undying fame—"the author of the Louisiana purchase"—which, alone of itself, entitles him to first place among American testers. In my independ it was the roots etwardene of all statesmen. In my judgment it was the most stupendous of all his acts. If he had never lived, somebody, sometime, would have written a Declaration of Independence. It most probably would not have possessed the majestic sweep and epic quality of Jefferson's Declaration, but it would have sufficed. If he had never been born, somebody would have written a statute for religious freedom in Virginia and would have established a great university in the Old Dominion; but if he had not been President in 1803 we would have never owned one square foot of land west of the Mississippi, and to-day all over that matchless country, where Old Glory floats, there would flutter in the breeze the banner of the Spanish bourbons, the tricolor of France, or the cross of St.

Jefferson belongs to the country, and the whole country, but he belongs especially to us living west of the Mississippi River.

His name is written on the mountain, His memory sparkles o'er the fountain; The meanest rill, the mightiest river, Rolls mingled with his fame forever.

And I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois right now that I have no apologies to offer for voting for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition appropriation; on the contrary, I glory in it.

And, further, I declare that the fact of my having voted to give $5,000,000 to celebrate one of the greatest events in American history is no reason why I should be estopped from opposing, whenever I feel like it, extravagant appropriations upon the floor of this House. Every tub must stand on its own bottom, and that is a very poor excuse to give for such extravagance. I now and here serve notice on all concerned that the remarks which I make here to-day on economy are simply a general preface to a line of conduct upon which I have determined to enter upon, and if any more extravagant measures get through this House while I am here they will do it after I have exhausted all parliamentary means to defeat them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct one statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

An impression quite generally exists—it has been repeated on this floor a number of times—that the $20,000,000 which this Government paid in concluding a treaty of peace with Spain was paid for the purchase of the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from Missouri quoted Mr. Day as authority for that statement. Without stopping to inquire what was said by Mr. Day, I wish to say to the House-and I shall take only a few minutes-that the $20,000,000 was paid no more for the purchase of the Philippine Islands than for the purchase of Porto Rico, Guam, the Isle of Pines, and for the cession of the sovereignty by Spain over Cuba.

The first controversy on the meeting of the peace commissioners was as to how much of the debt of Spain that she had pledged the revenues of Cuba for would the United States assume or provide that it should be assumed by Cuba. On that question almost a month was spent. Then the proposition was made whether, waiving that question temporarily, they could agree on other provisions of a treaty, the Spanish commissioners insisting that, if they waived that question temporarily, all other questions should stand in abeyance until the other questions of a treaty had been agreed upon by both commissions.

When the proposition to pay $20,000,000 was made by the American commission in the form of an ultimatum, not a single article of the treaty had been finally agreed upon, though the commissioners of both countries had gone over all the questions of a treaty, beginning with the cession of Spanish sovereignty over Cuba, the cession to the United States of all her islands in the West Indies, of Guam and the Philippines in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask the gentleman what did we give the $20,000,000 to Spain for?

Mr. GROW. To secure the concluding of a treaty of peace between the two Governments.

Mr. CLARK. Why did you have to pay for a treaty?

Mr. GROW. Because the Spanish commissioners would not have signed a treaty without any payment of money on what they called the Cuban debt.

Mr. CLARK. Do not you know that they would have had to sign any treaty that we offered?

Mr. GROW. Well, I was not there, and I do not think the gentleman from Missouri can speak for the commissioners. The controversy was that unless this Government would assume a controversy was that unless this Government would assume a part at least of the Cuban debt the Spanish commissioners would not sign a treaty. They would have gone home, and Spain would have said the American nation, with its great power, had seized the colonies of Spain, and in her weakness she could not prevent it.

Mr. CLARK. Do not you know that the American commissioners absolutely refused to consider the question of damages in

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir; I know that they refused to pay anything to Spain for the indebtedness of Cuba, or to permit Cuba to pay anything. That is why that question was passed over temporarily and the other questions were taken up to see if there could be any agreement about them. The Spanish commissioners had taken their position on what they insisted was international law. The American commissioners conceded that if a country takes a territory from a foreign government, upon which there is an obligation to pay an indebtedness, and it is absorbed by the conquering nation, then that nation is liable for such indebted-

That is international law. But the American commissioners said there was no obligation on this country to pay a debt of Cuba, for she was not absorbed into our territory. We were only a for she was not absorbed into our territory. W trustee; therefore international law did not apply.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise for the purpose of making a speech or to discuss any question, but to correct the misapprehension which has gone to the country through the newspa in the first place, and has been repeated on the floor of the House upon this subject. That misapprehension grows out of the statement that the $20,000,000 we paid Spain was for the purchase of the Philippine Islands; and I repeat that in all probability the negotiations for a treaty of peace with Spain would have failed had it not been for this payment on the part of the United States.

Senator Gray, one of the American commissioners, on his return to this country, in a speech in the city of New York, at a banquet of the Ohio Society, February 25, 1899, said:

There came a time in the course of those negotiations—and this, perhaps, is one of the secrets to which your president alluded—when, after four or five weeks of doubt and anxiety, it became apparent that these negotiations must either be broken off and your commissioners return without a treaty at all, and that would be relegated to the necessity of taking not only the Philippines, but Cuba and Porto Rico, by the ruthless hand of military conquest, or, by some concessions that comported with the magnanimity and greatnes and character of this country, gain them by the voluntary cession of a treaty of peace.

It was at such a time the offer was made as a final settlement of all the questions in dispute.

The payment of $20,000,000 to Spain provided for in the treaty was not, therefore, purchase money for the Philippine Islands. A careful examination of the negotiation on the several articles of the treaty shows conclusively that the $20,000,000 was finally agreed on to cover all the points of difference between the American and Spanish commissioners on all the articles of the treaty, none of which was finally concluded until the adoption of the last article.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. GROW. Certainly.
Mr. WHEELER. Does Does not the gentleman recollect the fact Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman recollect the fact that in the public instructions given by the President to the Paris commissioners that went out to the country, when they left for France, that there was no mention of the acquisition by the Government of the United States of the Philippine Islands; and does not he recollect further that while there was a general discussion as to the assumption of indebtedness on the part of the United States for the Spanish claims in Cuba, that the mention of $20,000,000 was never made by the commissioners in this conference until after they had delivered their ultimatum that they intended to take the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GROW. That was the last thing considered. The question of our taking the Philippine Islands was the last question discussed, and not a single article of the treaty had been finally agreed upon until the offer of the $20,000,000 in the form of an ultimatum. The Spanish commissioners said rather than leave the question open for a renewal of the war they were willing to receive this sum of $20,000,000 and would sign the treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. But does the gentleman dispute the question that the acquisition of the Philippines was not considered as a part of the instructions given to our peace commissioners at

Mr. GROW. I am giving the history of the treaty and the way it came to be signed, and the reasons for it.
Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak upon this question at any length. You will see, if you will read the documents connected with the matter, exactly what was done at each of the meetings of the Commission. You will see that these matters were all considered in detail, and finally, after all the other questions were considered, the question of the disposition of the Philippine Islands came up, the last thing in the negotiations except the status of the native inhabitants. The American commissioners said to the Spanish commissioners that if they took any of the islands they must take all of them.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman not admit that until the Philippine Islands were mentioned the question of the twenty millions was never suggested by the commissioners on either side?

Mr. GROW. Yes; because that was the last thing they discussed.

Mr. WHEELER. What was the last thing?

Mr. GROW. The amount to be paid to conclude a treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. The $20,000,000 was?

Mr. GROW. The taking of the Philippines was the last question discussed, and the $20,000,000 was an ultimatum to secure the signing of the treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. Was the $20,000,000 ever discussed until after that?

Mr. GROW. No, of course not, because that was an ultimatum. They took up each question by itself, and they went through with the question of the Philippines, which was the last one, and on that last one came this proposition as an ultimatum from our commissioners to the Spanish commissioners to conclude all the articles temporarily agreed to. If the $20,000,000 had not been offered there would have been no treaty signed, and it was for signing and concluding the whole treaty that the $20,000,000 was offered and paid, as an ultimatum.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman pardon one other question? Is it not true that before the $20,000,000 question had been mentioned the American commissioners had peremptorily declined to assume any of the Spanish debt?

Mr. GROW. Certainly, and tha Mr. GROW. Certainly, and that was what the Spanish com-missioners stood on. If this ultimatum had not been offered to conclude a treaty, they would have gone home without signing a treaty.

Mr. WHEELER. Well, that is a mere play upon words.

Mr. GROW. The Spanish commissioners said they could not go home to the Spanish people after signing a treaty that took away all their colonies and made no provision for the payment of any part of their indebtedness to Spain. It was as a substitute for the indebtedness that they were claiming on Cuba and these other colonies that the $20,000,000 came in, and the United States paid it rather than to leave the question of peace or war open.

mr. WHEELER. Is not that my friend's construction of it?

Mr. GROW. I am in bad voice for talking by reason of a cold, and I would not have spoken at this time if it had not been for the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. He relies upon one of the commissioners for his statement, and I simply rose, as Benton used to say, to vindicate the truth of history.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman answer one

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman answer one question before he takes his seat, because I do not want him to be misunderstood by the House?

Mr. GROW. I am not in condition to speak further, but I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state to the House that the Philippine Islands were not the consideration, or a part of the consideration, for which the $20,000,000 was paid?

Mr. GROW. No more a consideration for the Philippines than for Porto Rico or the cession of the sovereignty of Spain over Cuba; all alike in one. It had nothing to do especially with the Philippine Islands. That I assert on the history of this transac-

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I wish to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have read and reread carefully the proceedings of that Commission and I can not come to the conclusion which he has stated here, and I do not believe the House or the country will either.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman, of course, can draw what conclusion he should arrive at after reading the proceedings; I come to mine from reading it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Mr. GROW. We did not make the history, but we each of us can judge what it was, and as I stated in the beginning, so I close. I trust gentlemen will excuse me now. At some other time when I am in better voice I shall be happy to discuss this question further.

I conclude then with the statement, sustained by Mr. Gray when he came home, for he went there not intending to take any territory from Spain. He opposed it in the Senate before he went. In a conversation with him in the Senate Chamber after his return, he said, in the discharge of his duty as a commissioner, he came to the conclusion to join with his associates in taking the Philippine Islands. They could not give them back to Spain and leave them under a despotism from which we had released them in the fortunes of war.

This country could not take them and sell them to some other country. The offer of the $20,000,000 was, as I said before, made in order to secure the treaty: and if the gentleman would carefully read the last few pages of the report of these commissioners, he would find that the $20,000,000 was no more the consideration for the Philippines than for Porto Rico or the Isle of Pines, or the release of the sovereignty of Spain over Cuba.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. We might have treated them just as we did Cuba, and saved all the complications and embarrassments which have followed.

Mr. GROW. The entire proceedings of the Commission are published in Senate Executive Document No. 62 of the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. I will append to my remarks extracts from these proceedings which I think will sustain my October 1, 1898, the Peace Commission met at Paris.

From October 7 to October 26 the Commission was engaged in discussions on the debt of Cuba, amounting to about $500,000,000, and the cession by Spain of her sovereignty over the island, and the cession of Porto Rico and the Spanish islands in the West Indies, which ended temporarily with the following language:

The American commissioners deem it unnecessary, after what has been stated, to enter into an examination of the general references, made in the Spanish memorandum, to cases in which debts contracted by a state have, upon its absorption, been assumed by the absorbing state, or to cases in which, upon the partition of territory, debts contracted by the whole have been by special arrangement apportioned. They are conceived to be inapplicable, legally and morally, to the so-called "Cuban debt," the burden of which, imposed upon the people of Cuba without their consent and by force of arms, was one of the principal wrongs for the termination of which the struggles for Cuban independence were undertaken. (Executive Document No. 62, part 1, page 50.)

At the conference October 14, 1898, the following suggestion was made by the Spanish commissioners and agreed to by the American commission:

The Spanish commissioners stated that before proceeding with the discussion of the questions under consideration they desired it to be understood that if certain articles should be agreed to, but in the end no treaty should be signed, the articles so agreed to should not in such case be taken as expressing either Government's estimation of its just rights in respect of the subjects to which the articles related. (Senate Executive Document No. 62,

October 14, 1898 (Senate Executive Document No. 62, part 1, page 59):

After much discussion, the president of the Spanish commission stated that the Spanish commissioners did not care for the phraseology in which the relinquishments of sovereignty was expressed, so long as it embraced an obligation as to debts, such as was stated in the second of the articles presented by them.

The president of the American commission, replying to this statement, inquired whether the president of the Spanish commission intended thereby to say that the Spanish commissioners would refuse to consider any articles as to Cuba and Porto Rico which contained no provision for the assumption of indebtedness by the United States or Cuba, or both.

October 26, 1898 (Senate Executive Document No. 62, part 1, pages 61 and 62):

The Spanish commissioners, although understanding that strict law decides the question of the Cuban debt in their favor, are in duty bound and are willing to moderate the said strictness in view of the advantages which Spain may derive from other stipulations of the treaty which, without being prejudicial to the United States, may be favorable to Spain.

Considering, therefore, that the article or articles to which the president of the American commission refers can not at this time be the subject of final approval, since they must remain subject to the others to be included in the same treaty, meeting the approval of both high parties:

"The Spanish commissioners answer the said question by stating that, reiterating their conviction that pursuant to law the colonial obligations of Cuba and Porto Rico must follow these islands and their sovereignty, they do not refuse 'to consider any articles as to Cuba and Porto Rico which contain no provision for the assumption of indebtedness by the United States, or Cuba, or both,' subordinating the final approval of such articles to that of the others which are to form the complete treaty, and they therefore invite the American commissioners to enter upon the discussion of the other points to be embodied in the treaty and, at the outset, to take up the discussion of the Philippine Archipelago, and to propose to the Spanish commissioners what they understand should be agreed upon in said treaty with respect to this subject."

The American commissioners, after the reading of this paper, inquired whether they were to understand that the Spanish commissioners accepted the articles previously presented by them as to Cuba, Porto Rico, and Guam.

The Spanish commissioners replied that they accepted them in the sense stated in the paper—provisionally, subject to the conclusion of a treaty of peace.

October 31, 1898 (Senate Executive Document No. 62, part 1, pages 108, 109):

The American commissioners, having been invited by the Spanish commissioners at the last conference to present a proposition in regard to the Philippine Islands, beg to submit the following article on that subject:

"Spain hereby cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands and lying within the following lines: A line running along the parallel of latitude 2½ 3½ north from the one hundred and eighteenth to the one hundred and twenty-seventh degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich, thence along the one hundred and twenty-seventh degree meridian of longitude east of Greenwich to the parallel of 4 the fourth of the parallel of 1 the following lines: A line running along the parallel of 4 to Greenwich to the parallel of 4 the fourth latitude, thence along the parallel of 4 to Greenwich, thence along the parallel of 4 to Greenwich, thence along the parallel of 1 the following the following lines are set of the following the following the parallel of 1 the following lines are set of the following lines and the following lines are set of the following lines and lines are set of the following lines and lines are set of the following lines and lines are set of the lines and lines are set of the lines are set of the lines are set of the latitude of 1 the lines are set of the latitude of 1 the lines are set of the latitude of 1 the latitude of lines are set of the latitude lines are set of the latitude of lines are set of the latitude lines are November 4, 1898. Proposition of the American Commission to assume the indebtedness of the Philippine Islands was rejected by the Spanish commission.

November 23, 1898 (Senate Executive Document No. 62, part 1, pages 210, 211). The following is the reply of the American commissioners on the rejection of their proposition:

The situation that has arisen in the Philippines was neither foreseen nor desired by the United States, but, since it exists, that Government does not shirk the responsibilities growing out of it; and the American commissioners now make to the Spanish commissioners, in the light of those responsibilities, desired by the United States, but, since it exists, that Government does not shirk the responsibilities growing out of it; and the American commissioners now make to the Spanish commissioners, in the light of those responsibilities, a final proposition.

The proposal presented by the American commissioners in behalf of their Government for the cession of the Philippines to the United States having been rejected by the Spanish commissioners, and the counter proposal of the latter for the withdrawal of the American forces from the islands and the payment of an indemnity by the United States to Spain having been rejected by the American commissioners, the American commissioners, deeming it essential that the present negotiations, which have already been greatly protracted, should be brought to an early and definite conclusion, beg now to present a new proposition embodying the concessions which, for the sake of immediate peace, their Government is, under the circumstances, willing to tender.

The Government of the United States is unable to modify the proposal heretofore made for the cession of the entire archipelago of the Philippines, but the American commissioners are authorized to offer to Spain, in case the cession should be agreed to, the sum of $20,000,000, to be paid in accordance with the terms to be fixed in the treaty of peace.

And it being the policy of the United States to maintain in the Philippines an open door to the world's commerce, the American commissioners are prepared to insert in the treaty now in contemplation a stipulation to the effect that, for a term of years, Spanish ships and merchandise shall be admitted into the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as American ships and merchandise.

The American commissioners are also authorized and prepared to insert in the treaty, in connection with the cessions of territory by Spain to the United States, a provision for the mutual relinquishment of all claims for indemnity, national and individual, of every kind, of the United Stat

November 28, 1898, the Spanish commissioners reply to the ultimatum of the American commissioners in the following language (Senate Executive Document No. 62, part 1, page 213):

Spain having on her part exhausted all diplomatic recourses in the defense of what she considers her rights and even for an equitable compromise, the Spanish commissioners are now asked to accept the American proposition in its entirety and without further discussion, or to reject it, in which latter case, as the American commission understands, the peace negotiations will end, and the protocol of Washington will consequently be broken.

The Government of Her Majesty, moved by lofty reasons of patriotism and humanity, will not assume the responsibility of again bringing upon Spain all the horrors of war. In order to avoid them it resigns itself to the painful strait of submitting to the law of the victor, however harsh it may be, and as Spain lacks the material means to defend the rights she believes are hers, having recorded them, she accepts the only terms the United States offers her for the concluding of the treaty of peace.

It will be seen by these extracts from the official records of the discussions on propositions to be incorporated as articles in the treaty of peace that all of them were left in abeyance until the treaty should be finally agreed on; and the final conclusion of the treaty was the proposition on the part of the American commissioners to pay Spain $20,000,000, which should cover all the controversy from beginning to end about the cession of territory or the debts of Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands.

Then the different articles that had been passed over were agreed to, and the last one was that "The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to correct the gentleman from Missouri nor to detract from the part taken by President Jefferson in the Louisiana purchase; but I think the time has come when it should be stated upon the floor of this House that there was a man behind the President who will yet be recognized by all Americans as the one of all others responsible discussions on propositions to be incorporated as articles in the recognized by all Americans as the one of all others responsible for the Louisiana purchase.

I welcome the coming of the St. Louis Exposition, if for no other reason than that it will be the means of again bringing to the attention of the country the truth of history. It ought not to minimize the efforts of Thomas Jefferson, in so far as such efforts were rightly spent, but it will certainly bring into view the magnificent work of a distinguished New Yorker, Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, by whom and through whom the Louisiana purchase was made. [Applause.]

Napoleon announced his determination to sell whatever American territory he had obtained from Spain, and without hesitation Mr. Livingston took him up, agreed upon a price, and reported the transaction to Mr. Jefferson, who at once assumed that he had no constitutional authority to make the purchase. He went so far as to write intimate friends, members of the United States Senate, urging that they look with disfavor upon the proposition, since it could not be approved unless a constitutional amendment was adopted opening the way for its purchase by the Executive and its ratification by the Senate; but while Mr. Jefferson was arguing its unconstitutionality, Mr. Livingston completed the bargain, secured the cooperation of the Barings, who negotiated a loan of $15,000,000, the purchase price, and then sent a confidential letter to the President saying that unless the purchase be ratified at once, Napoleon would change his mind.

Upon the receipt of this letter President Jefferson dropped his Upon the receipt of this letter President Jefferson dropped his constitutional objections, wrote his Senatorial friends to say nothing about it, and urged them to get together and confirm the purchase without delay. That, in brief, is the history of the Louisiana purchase, and that history, wrought out in all its details by the orators who will be heard at the St. Louis Exposition, should be written in letters of gold and published from Maine to the Golden Gate, that the country may know that the man with the president of the property with the heard of the residue of the property of the nerve, with the breadth of mind, with the foresight to make that purchase and force its ratification was not Thomas Jefferson, the narrow constructionist of the Constitution, but Robert R. Livingston, one of New York's greatest and foremost statesmen.

[Applause.]

I do not wish to depreciate the part taken in that great historic transaction by the President of the United States, whose name is justly honored; but I do believe the time has come when all American citizens should recognize the fact that the man to whom we owe the honor and the debt of gratitude for the Louisiana purchase is Robert R. Livingston, of New York, and not Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia. [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a part of the to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a part of the report of the commissioners.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no other remarks to be made upon the bill the Clerk will read it by sections.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good many questions discussed to-day while this bill was under discussion, but there is one question that I think should be called to the attention of this House and the country before we pass the first sion, but there is one question that I think should be called to the attention of this House and the country before we pass the first bill that gentlemen on this side of the House will say is a raid on the Federal Treasury. I have been a member of Congress for some time. If I recollect rightly, some years ago an urgent deficiency bill carried very few millions of dollars. To-day we find reported to the House a bill carrying the largest appropriation, so far as my knowledge goes, that has ever been brought here as an urgent deficiency bill.

We not only find that the scope of the bill is changed. We been accustomed to unusual legislation in appropriation bills. have been accustomed to new legislation in sundry civil bills. We have been accustomed to changes by legislation on a general deficiency bill that comes at the end of a session; but we find now, in an urgent deficiency bill, that usually comes into this House merely for the purpose of paying off debts of the Government that Congress failed to provide for in the general bills of the last session, that new and unusual appropriations are made. We find that the Appropriation Committee has not been content with holding the purse strings of the nation, but that they propose to and have usurped the power of other committees of this House.

Now, I have heard gentlemen upon that side of the House, gentlemen who are members of the Appropriation Committee, time after time striking at other bills coming from other committees because they proposed new legislation, which was contrary to the rules of this House. They had given these reasons. Why? Because it was necessary to have them properly considered. I have heard them state time out of mind that when these great committees were constituted the Speaker selected members with a view to their knowledge of the particular questions considered; that men with that judgment and that knowledge were able to properly prepare the bills and present them to the House.

Now we find that these great questions are presented here by a committee that is not charged with any such duty. Why should this House in an urgent deficiency bill provide for the building of forts in the Philippine Islands? Why should it provide for the establishment of barracks in the Philippine Islands? Is it shown that the Secretary of War has been in communication with the that the Secretary of War has been in communication with the Appropriations Committee? Are the gentlemen constituting the membership of the Appropriations Committee more able to judge whether or not we ought to have a force of soldiers in the Philip-pine Islands than the committee that is charged with that duty, and who should orderly report a bill of that kind, and give us full knowledge and information as to the requirements?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit me, just there? Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. Mr. CANNON. This is a formal estimate that comes to Conress by way of provision for an expenditure of this Government for this current year. It is a matter of deficiency, because it is for the current year. The Secretary of War not only forwarded that estimate, but was before the subcommittee and had a hearing, and what he stated is printed in the hearings here, to which the gentleman can have access. The Committee on Military Affairs does not have jurisdiction of it at this time, because they make their appropriation for the coming fiscal year and not for make their appropriation for the coming fiscal year and not for the present year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the gentleman very clearly. If the Committee on Military Affairs had reported a bill at the last session of Congress, or this session, providing for an army barracks in the city of Manila, or had put a provision for the expenditures of the Army of the United States in that bill, and the appropriations were not sufficient to carry out the law that had been made by Congress, then it would have been very proper and correct for the Secretary of War to call upon the gentlemen constituting the Appropriations Committee to make up the deficiency. But I take it, from what I can learn on this matter, that the question of erecting these barracks was never heard of either in the committee or in this House until it came before the Appropriations Committee, and they were asked to put in a provision carrying the money to build these barracks and furnish the money for that purpose.

Now, I do not criticise the Secretary of War. I say candidly that I know of no man in the halls of the Congress of the United States that is more capable and able to put through legislation that he believes in than the gentleman from Illinois, or is more capable of defeating legislation that he is opposed to than the gentleman from Illinois. And when the Secretary of War wanted this provision put in here for his own purpose, he very properly went to the gentleman from Illinois to carry it through. But that does not warrant the Appropriation Committee in bringing it in, nor does it warrant us in continuing to appropriate money for new legislation without a fair consideration of it by the proper committees and the members of this House simply because the committees and the members of this House, simply because the heads of the great departments know that the most speedy route and the quickest road to accomplish what they want is to go to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, if he believes in their proposition and is willing to advocate it. As far as the House is concerned, it does not come here in the usual channels and in the

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois state whether General Chaffee recommends this appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the whole record is here. All the recommendations are printed as a public document.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, we come to another matter. I know it is absolutely useless to object to the insertion of these items in a general appropriation bill. I am not falling out with my friend from Illinois. I know the power that he exercises in this House and the power that he exert in the Congress of the United States. United States. I know that I or any other member of this House, when that provision comes before the House, can make a point of order striking it from the bill and send the bill out of the House of Representatives, as the rules of the House require that it should come into the House without new legislation. But I also know that when it goes to the Senate of the United States, by those methods that we all know and understand, that these provisions will be placed in this bill again, and they will come back here and either be unanimously consented to in conference or they will go back to the Appropriation Committee; and when it is reported again to the Committee of the Whole House it will be impossible for any member to strike those provisions of new legislation from the bill, because it will come back here as a Senate amendment.

It is not this particular item that I am objecting to. I do not the proposition. The other know the merits or the demerits of the proposition. The other day a bill was brought in here from the Pension Committee. The subcommittee having it in charge reported it without amendment. An individual member of the House rose in his seat and offered amendments to that bill for the benefit of the Federal soldier that he believed he was justified in offering, and that he could not get reported otherwise, and I, among others, insisted that this amendment should not be considered, but should be reported in order and properly.

Now, I say to the membership of this House that if that was provide that every member of the House shall stand on the same basis so far as the legislation of this country is concerned. You can not do it if you are going to legislate through the general appropriation bills.

appropriation bills.

I recognize the fact that the man who stands here alone and merely makes the point of order will lose his proposition when it comes back here from the Senate. If the membership on this side of the House, or the membership on that side of the House, who have stood here and explained to the country what they would do if they could have the opportunity, if they have the courage to stand up to their convictions and belief that they should have the same rights under the rules of this House to enact legislation that they believe in, they could enforce it. The men on that side of the House who go back to their constituents every fall and claim that they could not get legislation for the Federal soldiers of this country because they could not put it on the apsoldiers of this country because they could not put it on the appropriation bills, that the rules knocked them out and they could not get it from under the rules of the House, are placed in that position because they have not got the courage or sand to stand up here and enforce the rules when the Democratic party wants to halp them do it to help them do it.

If you have got individual members on that side of the House who want legislation, who have promised their constituents to give them legislation, who believe in these things—if you have got them legislation, who believe in these things—if you have got the courage of your convictions, to stand up here and prevent legislation in general appropriation bills, to let every committee stand on its own bottom, and if a gentleman wants legislation make him carry that legislation to the committee to which it belongs, then you can get what you want, and what your constituents want, and you won't do it until that time.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Sherman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9315) making appropriations to supply urgent defi-ciencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PURCHASE OF PANAMA CANAL

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:
